CONGRESSIONAL RECORD,

SIXTY-THIRD CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, March 21, 1914.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we come to Thee day by day for Thy blessing. We find ourselves always insufficient to deal with the mighty problems of life apart from the inspiration God may give to us, for within us and all men the most persistent and the dominant passion arises out of a sense of our relation to Thee and of our obligation to Thee. Human strength has never been sufficient for human responsibility. We pray that to-day God's grace as a positive, present force may be with each one of these Thy servants in the discharge of every duty, and that at the close of the day they may have the assurance that they have served God and the people well. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. SMOOT and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

To the President of the United States:

Whereas the United States of America is the land of free public schools; and

Whereas the class of foreigners who come to this country who can not stand the illiteracy test do not make good citizens, but rather are men without families who send money earned here to the land they owe allegiance to; and

Whereas there are about 3,000,000 working men and women idle in this the richest and grandest country in the world, men and women who are four-fifths native-born Americans, who have been crowded out by foreigners, who can live on very little, care nothing for the Government, know nothing about what the flag and Constitution stand for: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we, the undersigned, American voters, believing that the voice of the people is the voice of God and that the Government derives its power from the people, do hereby petition you, the President of the United States of America, to favorably consider and pass immigration bill H. R. 6060, including the illiteracy test: And be it further

Petitioned, That some action be taken that will relieve the terrible want and suffering of the men and women who to-day wonder if this is the land that the patriotic Washington and his followers fought and bled for with less provocation than the common people of to-day have.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the matter submitted by the Senator from Oklahoma will be printed in the RECORD:

The matter referred to is as follows:

STATE OF OKLAHOMA,
Oklahoma City, March 18, 1914.

Hon. ROBERT L. OWEN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I inclose herewith copy of a letter I have just written Hon. SCOTT FERRIS, chairman of the House Committee on the Public Lands, and a copy of a resolution adopted by the Commissioners of the Land Office, and request that you give the subject mentioned in the letter careful consideration.

The position taken by Hon. A. A. Jones, First Assistant Secretary of the Interior, in his communication to Hon. SCOTT FERRIS, of February 27 last, that the Arkansas is not a navigable stream, is so untenable, and, if adopted by Congress, will be so disastrous to the State of Oklahoma, that I can not too strongly urge upon you the necessity of opposing his view on the subject. If the Arkansas River is not a navigable stream, the rights of riparian owners extend to the center of the stream.

Practically all of the riparian owners along the bank of the Arkansas River in the oil region have executed leases to the big oil companies, and if the view taken by Mr. Jones is adopted, that the Arkansas River is not a navigable stream, the State of Oklahoma will be deprived of millions of dollars worth of oil and gas to which it is entitled, under the recent decision of our Supreme Court and of Judge Campbell, referred to in my letter to Mr. FERRIS. Hence, I most earnestly urge concerted action on the part of our Representatives and Senators to the end:

First. That the islands in the bed of the Arkansas River be withdrawn from entry by order of the President.

Second. That Congress do not reverse the position which it has maintained for more than 100 years with reference to the navigability of the Arkansas River, but that its position on the subject be reaffirmed.

Third. That Congress pass an act donating or selling for a nominal consideration all islands in the bed of the Arkansas River, which are not owned by any tribe or nation of Indians. It seems to me that the fact that millions of acres of land in this State are held by individual Indians, under treaties with the United States, exempt from taxation, is a conclusive reason why Congress should not hesitate to donate those islands to the State and let the State get the benefit which otherwise will go to the oil operators.

Very respectfully, yours,

LEE CRUCE, Governor.

MARCH 18, 1914.

Hon. SCOTT FERRIS, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I inclose herewith a certified copy of a resolution adopted on the 16th instant by the commissioners of the land office with reference to the donation to the State of Oklahoma by the United States of the islands in the beds of navigable streams of this State.

This action of the board is the direct result of a decision recently rendered by the supreme court of this State, wherein it was held: (a) That the Arkansas River is a navigable stream throughout its course in the State of Oklahoma, and the State owns the bed of that river below the high-water marks thereof; (b) that the rights of riparian owners cease at the high-water mark; (c) that as to islands of the river, the State owns to the high-water mark along the banks of the islands.

In view of the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Scott v. Lattig (227 U. S., 229, 57 Law Ed. 49) to the effect that an island in the bed of a navigable stream, in existence prior to the admission of the State into the Union, which rises above high-water mark, does not pass to the State, but remains the property of the United States, the question as to whether the State of Oklahoma or the United States is the owner of a number of islands in the bed of the Arkansas River is an extremely important one, and is involved in much doubt. I am informed that a number of these islands in the oil region are very valuable, and since the decision of our supreme court, rendered on the 10th of March, holding as above stated, that if the island rises above high-water mark it does not belong to the State of Oklahoma, a number of persons have appeared at the land office at Guthrie and attempted to file on these islands, claiming that the title is in the United States and that the islands are subject to entry as mining or preemption claims under the laws of the United States.

In view of the fact that there are millions of acres of land in this State held by individual Indians exempt from taxation it has occurred to me, as well as to other members of the Commissioners of the Land Office, that these islands should be donated to the State to compensate the State in part, at least, for the lands held by the wards of the United States as exempt from taxation.

I have before me your letter of March 4 to Gov. Haskell, inclosing a letter addressed to you, dated February 27, 1914, and signed by Hon. A. A. Jones, First Assistant Secretary of the Interior. I have noted carefully the reason given by Mr. Jones for not recommending the passage of House bill 13086, entitled "A bill providing for the sale to the United States of the unsurveyed islands in the bed of the Arkansas River within the boundaries of the State of Oklahoma."

Without going into a detailed answer to Mr. Jones's letter, I beg to say that the records in the land office of the State of Oklahoma show that there are a number of islands in the bed of the Arkansas River, and in proven oil territory, which have been in existence for many years and which have never been surveyed by the United States, these islands varying from a few acres to more than 100 acres in some instances, and the aggregate acreage amounting to perhaps 1,500 acres. Under the decisions referred to, it is extremely doubtful whether these islands belong to the State of Oklahoma or to the United States. It is my opinion that in all cases where they rise above high-water mark the title may be in the United States, but as to all islands or parts of islands which lie below the high-water mark the title is in the State of Oklahoma.

The primary objection urged by Mr. Jones to the passage of your bill seems to be that the Arkansas River is not a navigable stream. Among other things Mr. Jones says:

"The records in the General Land Office do not show whether or not the Arkansas River is navigable in Oklahoma, and I will invite attention to the United States Supreme Court decision in the case of Hardin v. Jordon (140 U. S., 371)."

He then quotes from that decision to the effect of the rights of riparian owners along nonnavigable streams extend to the center of the stream.

He also quotes from the case of Railroad Co. v. Schurmeirer (7 Wall., 272) to the same general effect.

These decisions, as a matter of fact, are wholly irrelevant. They relate to the rights of riparian owners along nonnavigable streams, and if the Arkansas is not a navigable stream, then the position of the First Assistant Secretary of the Interior is correct. But beginning in 1805 the United States has steadily maintained that the Arkansas River is a navigable stream. I invite your attention to the decision of the Supreme Court of Kansas, rendered in November, 1911, in the case of Dana v. Hurst et al. (86 Kans., 947; 122 Pac., 1041), where the Kansas Supreme Court reviewed all the legislation of Congress on the subject and finally reached the conclusion that the Arkansas River throughout Kansas is a navigable stream in law, and reversed the action of the lower court, wherein the navigability of the Arkansas River was submitted to the jury as a question of fact. This decision is important, but not more so than the decision of our own supreme court, rendered on the 10th of March, wherein precisely the same rule was announced. I am inclosing you a copy of this decision in order that you may see that our supreme court, following the Kansas Supreme Court, and also following the decision recently delivered by Judge Campbell, of the eastern district of Oklahoma, holds that the Arkansas River is a navigable stream under the laws of the State of Oklahoma and of the United States in such sense that the State, upon its admission into the Union, by virtue of its inherent sovereignty became the absolute owner of the bed of the stream below the high-water mark. The First Assistant Secretary of the Interior clearly missed the mark in his communication to you. As stated above, if the Arkansas River is not a navigable stream, the State of Oklahoma has no interest in it. But in view of the innumerable acts of Congress treating the Arkansas River as a navigable river and of the historical data referred to in the Kansas case and in the decision of our supreme court, it is at this time preposterous for the Interior Department to take the position that the Arkansas River is not a navigable stream.

I especially call your attention to that part of the decision of our Supreme Court rendered on March 10, wherein he quotes the letter of Hon. C. F. Larabee, dated March 26, 1908, to the Secretary of the Interior, wherein it appears that certain sand and gravel companies had, prior to the admission of the State of Oklahoma into the Union, operated sand and gravel plants in taking sand and gravel from the Arkansas River. After the admission of the State into the Union these companies sought to renew the contracts, but the renewal of the contracts was refused under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, because from and after the 16th day of November, 1907, when the Indian Territory became a part of the State of Oklahoma, neither the Cherokee Nation nor the Department of the Interior had any further jurisdiction over the matter, and the sand companies were thereupon referred to the State authorities for permission to operate their plants. The conclusion of the letter referred to is quoted by our Supreme Court, as follows:

"The Arkansas River throughout its length in the Cherokee Nation is a navigable stream under the laws of the United States.

"Under the above-quoted holding of the court it must be conceded that when the State of Oklahoma was created its jurisdiction and ownership of the lands below high-water mark of all navigable streams within its boundaries became absolute. In other words, when the United States conveyed by warranty deed the lands occupied by the Cherokees, Creeks, Choctaws, and Chickasaws, and Seminoles it did not convey the ownership of the beds of navigable streams, but reserved them for the benefit of the future State within whose boundaries they would fall. Thus the State of Oklahoma on its creation became absolute owner of the bed of the Arkansas River, and the Cherokee Nation is not entitled to royalty for any sand or gravel taken from the bed of that river since November 16, 1907.

"Very respectfully,

"(Signed) C. F. LARABEE,
"Acting Commissioner."

I also invite special attention to the second section of the act of Congress authorizing the Cleveland Bridge Co. to construct a bridge across the Arkansas River between Pawnee County, Okla., and the Osage Indian Reservation, approved February 17, 1897, published in chapter 238 of Twenty-ninth Statutes at Large, page 531, and which was also quoted by our Supreme Court, as follows:

"That the bridge constructed under this act shall be a lawful structure and shall be recognized as a post route, upon which no charge shall be made for the transmission over the same of the mails, the troops, and the munitions of war of the United States, and equal privileges in the use of said bridge shall be granted to all telegraph companies, and the United States shall have the right of way across said bridge and approaches for postal purposes: Provided, That before the construction of any bridge herein authorized is commenced the said company shall submit to the Secretary of War, for his examination and approval, a design and drawing of such bridge and a map of the location, giving sufficient information to enable the Secretary of War to fully and satisfactorily understand the subject; and unless the plan and location of such bridge are approved by the Secretary of War the structure shall not be built: Provided further, That any bridge constructed under authority of this act shall at all times be so kept and managed as to offer reasonable and proper means for the passage of vessels and other water craft through or under said structure, and for the safety of vessels passing at night there shall be displayed on said bridge from sunset to sunrise such lights or other signals as may be prescribed by the Lighthouse Board."

Also to the act of Congress, published at page 505, Twenty-ninth Statutes at Large, authorizing the Muskogee, Oklahoma & Western Railway Co. to construct and operate a line of railway through Oklahoma and the Indian Territory, quoted as follows:

"* * * And said railroad company is also hereby authorized, in case it so elects, for the greater accommodation of the public, to so construct its bridge across the Arkansas River as to make it a suitable and safe structure for the crossing of vehicles of all kinds, animals, and foot travelers, as well as railroad trains: Provided, That the plans of structure of all bridges across navigable streams along and upon the right of way herein provided for shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of War."

Many other acts of Congress have been passed, before and since the admission of Oklahoma, specifically recognizing the Arkansas River as a navigable stream, and regulating commerce thereon. Besides, several hundred thousand dollars have been appropriated by Congress for the improvement of navigation on the Arkansas River, on the theory that it is a navigable stream. In fact, there is absolutely no question about the navigability of the Arkansas River, and hence the letter of First Assistant Secretary Jones ought not to be taken as a basis for the refusal of Congress to donate to the State of Oklahoma the islands in the bed of the Arkansas River not owned by any Indian tribe.

I have written you upon this subject in detail, because I am strongly of the opinion that the islands in the Arkansas River, especially in the oil region, should be donated to the State, as stated above, in part compensation for the Indian lands which have been withdrawn from taxation under acts of Congress and treaties with the tribes.

I am taking the liberty to mail a copy of this letter to each of our delegation in Congress, and I suggest that this matter be again referred to the Interior Department with the request that special attention be given to the matter of the navigability of the Arkansas, also that the President be requested to withdraw all islands in the Arkansas River from entry.

The commissioners of the land office will be glad to cause the islands in the river to be surveyed and to furnish any further information which may be of assistance in bringing about the desired end.

Very respectfully, yours,

———— ————, Governor.

Mr. Wilson offered the following resolutions, to wit:

"Whereas Hon. Ralph E. Campbell, judge of the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Oklahoma, in the case of United States v. Mackey et al., held that the Arkansas River, as a matter of law, is a navigable stream, and that the State of Oklahoma is the owner of the bed of said stream; and

"Whereas the Supreme Court of the State of Oklahoma, in the case of State of Oklahoma v. Larry Nolegs et al., in a decision rendered on the 10th day of March, 1914, held that the Arkansas River, as a matter of law, is a navigable stream throughout its course in the State of Oklahoma, and that the State of Oklahoma is the owner of the bed of said river below the high-water mark along the banks of the same; and

"Whereas in the case of Dana v. Hurst et al. (88 Kan., 947; 122 Pac., 1041), in November, 1911, the Supreme Court of Kansas held that the Arkansas River is a navigable stream, as a matter of law, throughout the State of Kansas, and that its navigable character is not subject to dispute in private litigation, and that the State of Kansas is he owner of the bed of said river; and

"Whereas in all three of said decisions it is decided that the rights of riparian owners, holding under patents issued by authority of the United States to lands abutting on the banks of said river cease at the high-water mark, and that the State has the exclusive right to determine the extent to which riparian owners may hold in the beds of navigable streams; and that in the said decision rendered by Judge Campbell and the decision rendered by the Supreme Court of the State of Oklahoma it is held that under the laws of the State of Oklahoma the rights of riparian owners along the banks of the Arkansas River cease at the high-water mark, and that the State owns all that part of the bed of the Arkansas River which lies below the high-water mark; and

"Whereas in said decision of the Supreme Court of the State of Oklahoma it was held that as to islands in the bed of the Arkansas River the rights of the State extend to the high-water mark along the banks of said islands; and

"Whereas in the case of Scott v. Lattig (227 U. S., 229; Law Ed. 57, p. 49) the Supreme Court of the United States held that an island in the bed of a navigable stream, being in existence when the State was admitted into the Union, did not pass to the State upon its admission to statehood or come within the disposing influence of its laws, but remained the property of the United States, subject to disposal by it; and

"Whereas there are in the bed of the Arkansas River and other navigable streams of the State, in the oil region, a number of islands which were in existence before the admission of the State of Oklahoma into the Union, said islands varying in size from a few acres up to as much as 100 acres, a part of said islands being above high-water mark; and

"Whereas it is doubtful as to whether or not said islands passed to the State of Oklahoma upon its admission into the Union or remained the property of the United States; and

"Whereas said islands are chiefly valuable because of the oil and gas contained therein; and

"Whereas said islands are now being surveyed and filed on by private persons, claiming that said islands belong to the United States and are subject to entry and appropriation under the laws of the United States; and

"Whereas in the immediate vicinity of the location of each of the said islands in the oil region thousands of acres of land are being held by members of the Creek, Osage, and other tribes of Indians, exempt from taxation under the laws of this State: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That this resolution be sent to each and every Member of Congress from the State of Oklahoma and to Senator OWEN and Senator GORE, with the request that immediate steps be taken to withdraw each and all of the islands in the bed of the Arkansas River from entry for private appropriation under the preemption laws of the United States, as well as the mining laws of the United States; and that the President of the United States be requested forthwith to issue a proper order withdrawing said islands from entry; and that our Representatives and Senators be, and they are hereby, requested to exert all the influence in their power to procure the passage of an act donating all islands in the beds of navigable streams in the State not owned by any tribe or nation of Indians to the State of Oklahoma."

CERTIFICATE.

STATE OF OKLAHOMA, County of Oklahoma, ss:

I, John R. Williams, the duly appointed, qualified, and acting secretary to the commissioners of the land office of the State of Oklahoma, do hereby certify that the above and foregoing is a full, true, and correct copy of a resolution adopted by the commissioners of the land office of the State of Oklahoma at their meeting held on March 16, 1914, as shown by the original minutes of said meeting on file in my office.

In witness whereof I hereunto affix my hand and official seal on this the 18th day of March, 1914.

[SEAL.]

JNO. R. WILLIAMS,
Secretary to the Commissioners of the Land Office of the State of Oklahoma.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. BORAH submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $500 to reimburse the State Board of Regents of the University of Idaho for the premium paid on an indemnity bond on account of the loss of a United States draft of $25,000 in transit between the United States Treasury and the State treasury of Idaho, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PERKINS submitted four amendments intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which were referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. O'GORMAN submitted an amendment providing that all permanent officers of the Quartermaster Corps, created by the act of August 24, 1912, on the active list and below the grade of brigadier general shall be arranged in each grade according to date of original entry, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Army appropriation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

MINING ON THE PUBLIC DOMAIN.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a motion in the nature of a resolution, coming over from a preceding day. It will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Motion of the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] that the Committee on Mines and Mining be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 4898) to encourage and promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, potassium, and sodium on the public domain, and that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. MYERS. As my colleague [Mr. WALSH] is not present in the Chamber, I ask that the motion may go over for the day without prejudice, and remain on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it goes over.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the following resolution, coming over from a preceding day, which will be read.

The Secretary read Senate resolution 309, submitted by Mr. JONES on the 20th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the President be, and he is, requested, if not incompatible with the public interests, to advise the Senate what nations have protested against the passage of coastwise vessels through the Panama Canal free of tolls, what representations have been made regarding the same, and copies of all communications received from foreign countries relating thereto, together with copies of answers submitted by the United States.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names?

Ashurst	Gronna	Norris	Smoot
Bankhead	Hughes	O'Gorman	Stephenson
Borah	Johnson	Oliver	Sterling
Bradley	Jones	Overman	Sutherland
Brandegee	Kenyon	Perkins	Swanson
Bristow	La Follette	Pittman	Thomas
Bryan	Lea, Tenn.	Pomerene	Thompson
Burleigh	Lee, Md.	Reed	Tillman
Burton	Lippitt	Shafroth	Townsend
Catron	McCumber	Sheppard	Vardaman
Chamberlain	McLean	Sherman	Walsh
Chilton	Martin, Va.	Smith, Ariz.	Warren
Clark, Wyo.	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Ga.	West
Dillingham	Myers	Smith, Md.	Works
du Pont	Nelson	Smith, S. C.

Mr. REED. I wish to state that my colleague [Mr. STONE] is still kept from the Senate by illness. I make this announcement for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-nine Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, I desire to say a word regarding the motion which I understand is now pending, and which was offered by the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH].

I believe that the information sought by the resolution introduced some days ago by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] will be very helpful to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals in intelligently passing upon the various bills now before that committee. But I recognize the propriety of having this resolution in the first instance go to the Committee on Foreign Relations, because it clearly affects the relations existing between this country and foreign nations.

I shall, therefore, vote with the Senator from Georgia to have the resolution go at this time to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I simply desire to say that I have no particular objection to the resolution going to the Committee on Foreign Relations, because I assume that that committee will act with reasonable promptness on the resolution. Therefore I have no special opposition to make to the motion of the Senator from Georgia, believing, as I do, that the committee will act promptly on the matter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] to refer the resolution to the Committee on Foreign Relations. [Putting the question.] The ayes have it, and the resolution is referred.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, when the resolution first came up I suggested that it should go to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, but I am perfectly satisfied with the attitude which the chairman of that committee, the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] has taken. My purpose was to withhold action in the Senate, if possible, until his return, so that he could give it consideration. If the Committee on Foreign Relations give it attention, so that when the bills are before the Committee on Interoceanic Canals for consideration we may have the information, it will be entirely satisfactory to me as a member of that committee.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I do not see any occasion for the Senator from Kansas——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The ayes have it, and the resolution is referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SWANSON. I do not see occasion for the Senator from Kansas to criticize the Committee on Foreign Relations. We have reported nearly all the bills that have come to us. We try to do our duty as well as any other committees of the Senate, and I am satisfied the resolution will have fair consideration there. I do not like the tone of the Senator's criticism of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I withdraw the tone, if I can, and let the words stand without the tone, if that will satisfy the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. OVERMAN. That will help it some.

Mr. SWANSON. That will be a little help. It is as much as I expected the Senator from Kansas to be generous enough to do.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair desires to state that there is a resolution now on the Table Calendar which is identical with the one just referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. JONES. I have no objection to that resolution being indefinitely postponed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, Senate resolution 288, submitted by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] on the 6th instant, will be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, in connection with the little colloquy between the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] I will say that while I do not think the reference here would apply to the proceedings of this body, yet there is a very interesting statement contained in the Washington Post of this morning which I shall ask to have read by the Secretary.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. On what subject?

Mr. JONES. The article is headed "Wilson limits toll debate."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I object, Mr. President.

Mr. JONES. Well, Mr. President, I will just read it myself.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I call for the regular order.

Mr. JONES. I have the floor, I think.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The regular order, Mr. President, is the point of order. I raise the point of order that the Senator is not addressing himself to anything that is before the Senate, and that we are entitled to proceed with the regular order during the morning hour.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is submitted to the Senate, Shall the paper be read?

Mr. JONES. I am not asking the Secretary to read the paper now; I am asking for recognition.

The VICE PRESIDENT. When an objection is made to a Senator reading a paper, it is the same as though objection were made to the Secretary reading it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No.

Mr. JONES. I will not ask the Chair to put the question, because I will read the article in my own right a little later on.

JAMES F. SELLERS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed. The calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate resolution 278. I will state that I can only remain in the Chamber for a few moments, and I am exceedingly anxious to have this resolution acted on. I have not been well, and I wish to go home.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution for which the Senator from Pennsylvania asks consideration will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 278) reported by Mr. WILLIAMS from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate on the 6th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to appoint James F. Sellers an additional messenger, who shall be paid at the rate of $1,200 per annum from the contingent fund of the Senate, upon vouchers to be approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, until otherwise provided for by law.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, in connection with the consideration of the resolution, I desire to read an article contained in this morning's Washington Post. It is as follows:

WILSON LIMITS TOLL DEBATE—HOUSE IS TO MAKE BITTER FIGHT ON HIS REPEAL ULTIMATUM.

NEW YORK, March 20.

A Washington dispatch to the Herald says: President Wilson sent word to leaders of the House to-day that he believed 15 hours of debate on the Panama Canal tolls exemption repeal bill was sufficient, and that he was opposed to further discussion of it. The news was quickly spread about the Chamber and caused much ill feeling. It was predicted that a bitter fight would be precipitated on the gag rule which the Rules Committee will bring in to facilitate the progress of the bill. It is likely that the bill will be brought up next Tuesday or Thursday.

There has been an insistent demand in the House that Members be given more time in which to discuss tolls repeal, both from those who favor it as well as those who oppose it. Promises of "time" have been made, and it will be impossible to keep these promises if the President persists in his attitude. Representative UNDERWOOD, because of the fact that he is opposing the repeal, under the rules receives his allotment of time from the member of the Interstate Commerce Committee who is leading the opposition. This Member is Representative KNOWLAND, of California, and he has promised Mr. UNDERWOOD an hour. He will be unable to give him an hour if the President insists on limiting the debate.

Mark you, Mr. President, that is limiting debate in the House of Representatives, or in another body than this.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator from Washington really believe that that is a correct report?

Mr. JONES. Well, I am inclined to think that some suggestions were probably made that this bill ought to be hurried.

Mr. BORAH. Of course——

Mr. JONES. Probably not as strongly as in the language stated here, but such suggestions must, you know, have considerable weight, coming from certain sources.

Mr. BORAH. I have no means of knowing, and I am not reflecting upon the veracity of the reporter, but I should be inclined to doubt whether the President made any such suggestion to the Congress of the United States.

Mr. JONES. He has not made it to Congress.

Mr. BORAH. Well, when he makes it to the other House he makes it to a branch of Congress, I should say, or to the House itself.

Mr. JONES. It has not been made formally to the other House.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Would the Senator from Idaho think such a suggestion would be improper if such a suggestion were made?

Mr. BORAH. That is the reason I do not believe the President of the United States would make such a suggestion.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. JONES. I simply want to say that we see in almost every morning paper the statement that this Senator or that Representative has gone up to the President to confer with him and ask whether or not a certain bill is framed up to suit him or whether a certain amendment should go in, and that the President has said that this bill is satisfactory to him or that this amendment is not satisfactory to him. Whether or not those statements are correct, I do not know; but such statements occur so frequently that it has seemed to me that there must be some foundation for them.

I will say to the Senator from Idaho that I do not accept every statement that is in the newspapers. I have had some little experience in the last day or two which shows me that such statements are not always entirely accurate. While I do not generally refer to such statements, I will simply say that I noticed the other day in different newspapers that it was stated that in a conversation which I had with the President with reference to some remarks submitted by me a few days ago the President had told me that "I was skating on thin ice." No suggestion of that kind was ever made by the President in my presence. If it was made afterwards, it was made for consumption by the press, and the press apparently got it in some way; but I will say that no such suggestion and no such statement as that was made to me.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. POMERENE. I desire to ask the Senator from Washington whether the ice was any thicker this morning?

Mr. JONES. I wish to say that, so far as I am concerned, I wish that I were skating on ice, even thin ice, on this proposition. I wish it would develop that the President had some good reason for the position which he has taken. I would be perfectly willing to be blown up or to be sunk down in order that what I consider to be the honor and integrity of the Nation should be maintained.

I want to say, Mr. President, that this is not——

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. JONES. In just a moment. This is not with me a party proposition. I am not seeking to bring any discredit upon the Democratic Party or anything of that kind in this matter, because I am sincerely and unalterably opposed to the proposition that has been suggested.

Mr. OVERMAN. It is not upon the Democratic Party, but upon the President of the United States.

Mr. JONES. No; not because it is coming from the present President, but I should be opposed to it if it should come from any President of the United States. I am opposed to it on the merits of the proposition.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. THOMAS. I merely wish to say, Mr. President, to the Senator from Washington that, so far as I am individually concerned, I think I see the President of the United States as frequently as any business which I have to confer with him about permits. I think a great many who do not pursue such a course perhaps would be benefited by so doing; and I think if the Senator from Washington himself would come in contact with the President more frequently than he does he would be a much better man and would be much better informed about a great many things.

Mr. JONES. I shall be very glad to get any information possible that the President may see fit to give me with reference to this matter. I have been seeking such information here, but my Democratic friends seem to want to delay it as much as possible. I offered what I thought a very innocent resolution and one which I supposed could be very easily answered, and yet it must go to a committee and all that sort of thing, to which I have no objection; but I will say to my friend from Colorado that I should be delighted to visit the President often and should be delighted to receive an invitation to go to the White House and get information from him with reference to any of these important matters, and especially with reference to this matter. I want, however, to finish the reading of this article. I want to say that I am not vouching for the truth of the statement, but if it does not do anything else, if Senators say that there is no foundation for it, it will, at least, call to the attention of the country the character of the reports which they read in the newspapers from day to day; and if Senators say there is nothing in these statements, the country probably will learn that in the newspaper reports which they read with reference to this subject, that subject, and so on, no credence is to be placed whatever.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. JONES. I think I will finish the reading of this article, and then I will yield. The article in the Washington Post continues:

> Friends of the President said they regretted he had gone so far as to limit debate. They declared, in view of the fact that he was assured of the passage of the bill, he should not insist on limiting debate and could afford to be generous. They were afraid, they said, that this policy would result in rather free criticism of the White House's attitude.

Then, in the Washington Herald of this morning, there is this statement:

> Senator OWEN, acting under instructions from the White House, asked for immediate action on the repeal bill. Senator O'GORMAN, after a conference with his supporters, announced that the matter would not be taken up until the latter part of next week.
> The President's effort to get immediate action in the House was even more insistent. Congressman SHERLEY was called to the White House and asked to announce for the President that the bill should be passed immediately and with as little discussion as possible. The White House urges that debate be limited.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I am glad the Senator from Washington has called attention to the articles appearing in the press indicating that the President of the United States has assumed toward Congress an attitude of domination. Such articles cause a natural feeling of irritation in an equal and coordinate branch of the Government, and at times I have experienced this feeling; but I have come to the conclusion, as a result of not infrequent communication with the President, that such statements are inaccurate and exaggerated.

I have differed from my party and from the President regarding the details of two of the most important measures which have been before Congress—the tariff and the banking and currency legislation—and I differ from the President regarding the Panama tolls. I thought that the reductions accomplished by the new tariff ought to be distributed over a period of three years and that they should not go into full effect immediately. I had several interviews with the President regarding the question of policy. I was desirous of reaching ultimately an even lower level of tariff than my party thought requisite under existing conditions, but I wanted to reach that level by a gradual process. Never during any of those interviews did I find the least indication of any disposition on the part of the President to urge unduly his views upon Congress; and yet during that time the press were constantly giving out statements to the effect that this Representative or that Senator was being brought into line.

So also with reference to the banking and currency measure. I believed there should be no capital requirement of the member banks beyond the proportion of their reserves required by the new law to be turned over to the reserve banks, and I believed in a Federal system as opposed either to a central system or a regional system, a Federal system with a reserve bank in each State, the whole structure to be capped by a Federal reserve bank at Washington in close touch with all the State reserve banks. I was tenacious of my views regarding that measure, and I had conferences with the President. Never during those interviews was there the least indication of any disposition to urge unduly the presidential view, but simply an expression generally for party harmony without undue urgency.

So also upon the trust question I have had occasion to interview the President frequently; and during that time I found that the expressions of the press were frequently at variance with my experience with the President himself in those intercommunications, communications which were conducted, I trust, with dignity upon both sides and with regard upon the part of both for the proprieties belonging to the high office of each.

So I have come to the conclusion that there is a studied effort upon the part of the press—or, at least, a part of the press—to make it appear to the people of the United States that the President is a taskmaster, and that he is endeavoring to dominate and to control Congress. We all know that his public utterances have nothing of that character; his messages to Congress could not be couched in language of more respect or courtesy; and I feel sure that the President in his relations with all Congressmen bears himself as he has borne himself in his relations with myself—as a gentleman of dignity, courtesy, and tolerance, conscious of the proprieties that attach to his office and conscious of the proprieties that attach to the office of those who come into communication with him. Whilst I have differed with the President upon matters of detail, I wish to say that I have always found the utmost tolerance upon his part for difference of view and patient consideration of the opinions of those with whom he is brought in contact. It is this spirit which has been so potent in producing the solidarity that is making the Democratic Party an efficient instrumentality in the promotion of the public good.

I say these few words—and I have no doubt my experience is that of all upon this side—because I think it is time that this effort upon the part of the press to give the President the character of a taskmaster should be checked.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I have followed the debate as closely as possible, with a view of arriving at a correct decision upon the pending resolution. I did not, however, exactly follow the various conflicting views upon the subject, nor hear distinctly the resolution. I ask that it be read again.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the pending resolution.

The Secretary read as follows:

> Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to appoint James F. Sellers an additional messenger, who shall be paid at the rate of $1,200 per annum from the contingent fund of the Senate, upon vouchers to be approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, until otherwise provided for by law.

Mr. OVERMAN. I should like to inquire what that is for?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. He might be utilized in bringing the advice from the White House to Congress.

Mr. OVERMAN. I should like to know some reason for the passage of this resolution authorizing the appointment of an additional messenger at $1,200. It seems to me it ought to have gone to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, it went to the Committee on Contingent Expenses.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is not the proper committee for it. Before the committee could authorize it to be done it would have to be recommended by some other committee, of course.

Mr. OLIVER. I will state that this man was disabled from performing active duty while in the discharge of his duty; and the Committee on Contingent Expenses, in considering his case, thought it but right that he should be continued on the permanent roll of the Senate, just as was the case with Lynch and others of the same kind. He is able to perform light duties, but not the usual duties of the position.

Mr. OVERMAN. May I inquire what salary he is getting now?

Mr. OLIVER. I really do not know.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think this would be not only placing him on the permanent roll but giving him an increase of salary.

Mr. OLIVER. He is getting the salary of a policeman, whatever that is.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand he is getting only $1,050 now. Why, Mr. President, the contingent expenses of the Senate have increased this year over $50,000, of which $36,000 was for such resolutions as this. I do not know where we are going to end. We are passing resolutions here every day asking for this clerk and that clerk, and then passing resolutions increasing these messengers' salaries. Not only does this resolution propose to place this man on the permanent roll of the Senate, but it proposes to pay him $1,200 a year instead of the salary he is now getting.

I think the resolution ought to go to the Committee on Rules, in order that it may inquire into the facts and see something about the matter. I move, therefore, that it be referred to the Committee on Rules, where it ought to have gone originally.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Let me ask the Senator from North Carolina a question, as I am not familiar with these matters. The Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate authorizes the employment of stenographers and clerical assistance, does it not?

Mr. OVERMAN. It does.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. What would be the distinction between that and this?

Mr. OVERMAN. I think the Committee on Rules generally looks after the number of employees the Senate has, makes estimates, and such matters. I do not think the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate ought to decide whether or not we need another messenger. I think the proper place for the resolution to go is to the Committee on Rules, or some other committee; I do not care what it is.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The true function of the Committee on Contingent Expenses is to decide whether it can furnish the money when some other committee desires an appropriation for some line of work under its jurisdiction.

Mr. SMOOT. I think that statement, broadly speaking, is correct; but, as I remember, the resolution reads that this man shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate. If there were a general appropriation made for the employment of a certain number of clerks, such as every legislative appropriation bill carries, and he were to be paid out of the general appropriation, the proper committee for it to have been referred to would have been the Rules Committee.

As I remember, however—I may be mistaken—this payment is to be made from the contingent fund of the Senate. If so, the resolution was referred to the proper committee; and, as I understand, the chairman of that committee reported it favorably to the Senate.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not mean to say that the committee ought not to have it after it has been inquired into and some other committee has reported it favorably, as has been done here in the past. I will ask the Senator from Kansas if that has not been done heretofore—that resolutions to inquire into the necessity of these people for the purpose desired go to some other committee, and then, when the expense is to be paid out of the contingent fund, they are referred to the Committee on Contingent Expenses. I think the Senator will bear me out in the statement that that is the rule.

Mr. BRISTOW. I do not remember a precedent for this case. The employees that the Committee on Contingent Expenses authorizes, I think, are for committees; and at the request of the chairman of the particular committee the Committee on Contingent Expenses frequently authorizes the employment of an additional clerk for a period of time.

This particular case was brought before the Committee on Contingent Expenses. The chairman of the committee is more familiar with it than I am, and I speak only in his absence. He handled the matter. I see that there is no majority member of that committee present now. The resolution was brought before the committee. This man, as I remember, was disabled while acting as policeman. In putting up the flag on the Senate Building he was crippled on the icy roof, and is no longer capable of performing hard work, and he is now serving as a messenger.

Mr. OVERMAN. No; he is not serving as a messenger. He is serving as a policeman.

Mr. BRISTOW. He is serving as a messenger. I do not know what roll he is on, but the work he is doing is messenger work, here at this door.

Mr. OVERMAN. No; he stands at that door as a policeman. That is the position he has now. His compensation is $1,050 a year.

Mr. BRISTOW. He is, as I understand, on the police roll, but he is not doing police duty any more than any of the messengers are. He is doing the same work that the messengers here at the door are doing.

Mr. OVERMAN. No; he is acting as a policeman at that door. We always have a policeman there. He is working as a policeman, in uniform, and he is getting $1,050 a year. This resolution proposes to give him $1,200, and to let him continue the work he has been doing, I suppose, for 15 years.

Mr. BRISTOW. I desire to say that the chairman of the committee, the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], handled this case, and it was upon his recommendation that the committee authorized the employment. I had supposed that it was regular and according to the uniform practice. The precedents I have in mind, where the committee has authorized employment, have been where different Senate committees have requested additional help.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is right.

Mr. BRISTOW. And of course they have been provided with it or it has been denied, as the committee thought wise.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, before this resolution is referred to another committee I think the Senate ought to be informed as to the merits of the case; and I hope, after hearing what this man has to say, they will take action on the matter to-day. I read now an affidavit from Mr. Sellers.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, as has been suggested to me by the Senator from Kansas, if the Senator will let this matter go over, the chairman of the committee probably will be here. I do not want to take any advantage of the Senator, nor of the committee. It simply occurs to me that the matter ought to be inquired into by the Committee on Rules. Therefore if the Senator from Pennsylvania will agree to let it go over until the Senator from Mississippi is here, probably it would be better.

Mr. OLIVER. I will agree to that, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution goes back to the calendar.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I observe that the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] read an article from the Washington Herald of this morning, making the announcement that "Senator OWEN, acting under instructions from the White House, asked for immediate action on the repeal bill," and so forth. It seems hardly necessary to say that the statement has no authority or foundation in fact. The Senator from Washington apparently gives it credit, and I suppose he used it as the basis of a speech. I wish to ask the Senator from Washington whether he desires to vouch for the accuracy of this statement.

Mr. JONES. Why, certainly not.

Mr. OWEN. I should like to ask the Senator why he read it into the RECORD, then?

Mr. JONES. Simply to call the attention of the country to what is coming out in the papers every day. As I stated a moment ago, I think I would serve a good purpose if I called the attention of the people to statements printed in the papers from day to day that Senators say are absolutely baseless, and have no foundation in truth and in fact.

Mr. OWEN. The Senator, then, does not approve this matter as true?

Mr. JONES. Why, I know nothing about it one way or the other. I know nothing about it. It is printed there. It speaks for itself. I do not know whether there is any foundation for it or not. I hope there is none.

Mr. OWEN. I will state to the Senator, in the first place, that the Senator from Oklahoma not only had received no such instructions, but he had not, in fact, spoken to the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], who is in charge of the matter. The chairman of the committee, the Senator from New York, has been absent. I should, however, like to have action on the matter as early as possible; and I desire to make a brief comment on the attitude of the Senator from Washington in pressing this resolution to ascertain what nations have protested against the passage of coastwise vessels through the Panama Canal free of tolls. Evidently the Senator does not want that resolution to go to the proper committee.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I have not objected to its going to the committee. I consented this morning.

Mr. OWEN. I thought the Senator was insisting——

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has already been referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, this question has all been settled, and I ask for the regular order.

Mr. OWEN. I join the Senator in requesting the regular order if it has been disposed of. I desired that it should go to the Committee on Foreign Relations, where it belongs.

Mr. SMOOT. That is the committee to which it has gone.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The regular order is demanded. The calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, I wish to confirm, if confirmation were required, the statement made by the Senator from Oklahoma that he has never spoken to me with reference to the bill which he introduced some days since. While I was absent for a few days the Senator was also absent on a very worthy mission to New England. Without receiving any suggestion from the Senator who introduced the bill, I, as chairman of the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, have conferred with certain members of the committee as to the date for an early meeting, and it has been discovered that owing to the absence at this time of one or two members of the committee a date can not now be fixed for a meeting. However, I expect that a date can be arranged in the near future.

THE CALENDAR.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The calendar under Rule VIII is in order. The Secretary will state the first business on the calendar.

BILL PASSED OVER.

The first business on the calendar was the bill (S. 1240) to establish the legislative reference bureau of the Library of Congress.

Mr. OWEN. Let that bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

FOREST PRODUCTS EXPOSITIONS.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of order of business 294, House joint resolution 204, authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to make exhibits at forest products expositions to be held in Chicago, Ill., and New York, N. Y.

Mr. SMOOT. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 1760) for the restoration of annuities to the Medawakanton and Wahpakoota (Santee) Sioux Indians, declared forfeited by the act of February 16, 1863, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 655) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to survey the lands of the abandoned Fort Assinniboine Military Reservation and open the same to settlement was announced as next in order.

Mr. MYERS. I ask that the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 41) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to sell or lease certain public lands to the Republic Coal Co., a corporation, was announced as next in order.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I ask that the resolution go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be passed over.

Mr. MYERS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution, notwithstanding the objection. It seems to me every bill and resolution is entitled to its day in court, and to be passed or defeated some time in the lifetime of a generation.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. MYERS. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. We have had this bill up for two or three days.

Mr. MYERS. Yes; but it has been on the calendar 11 months.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator to wait a minute.

Mr. JONES. I make the point of order that the motion is not debatable.

Mr. MYERS. All right.

Mr. SMOOT. I am not debating it. I wish to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. MYERS. All right.

Mr. SMOOT. Will not the Senator consent that we shall consider the calendar now and take up the bills to which there is no objection?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Upon examination of the rules, the Chair finds that the motion is not in order. There being an objection, the joint resolution goes over.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. May I ask the Chair if it is not only during the transaction of morning business——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The rule provides that at the hour of 1 o'clock a motion similar to that proposed by the Senator from Montana may be made.

Mr. MYERS. Then I give notice now that at 1 o'clock I will move to take up the joint resolution.

POLITICAL CONTRIBUTIONS.

The bill (S. 2242) making it unlawful for any Member of Congress to serve on or solicit funds for any political committee, club, or organization was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will go over.

MINERAL LANDS IN INDIAN RESERVATIONS.

The bill (S. 2651) providing for the purchase and disposal of certain lands containing kaolin, kaolinite, fuller's earth, and other minerals within portions of Indian reservations heretofore opened to settlement and entry was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On February 10 the amendment of the Committee on Public Lands striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting a substitute was agreed to.

Mr. STERLING. I wish to offer an amendment approved by the committee to that amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the vote by which the amendment was agreed to as in Committee of the Whole will be reconsidered. The Chair hears no objection. The amendment submitted by the Senator from South Dakota to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 6, in the first line of the amendment of the committee, insert the word "the," so as to read:

That all lands containing the minerals.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STERLING. On page 2, line 6, after the word "minerals," I move to strike out the words "except those herein specifically reserved" and insert in lieu thereof the words "kaolin, kaolinite, fuller's earth, china clay, and ball clay."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STERLING. On page 2, line 16, after the word "That," I move to strike out the word "all" and all that follows down to and including the word "but" at the end of line 22.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STERLING. The committee reports an amendment to the title of the bill, which will come up after its passage.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to have the bill read as it has been amended. I could not follow the amendments with the print I have before me.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment of the committee as amended will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and in lieu to insert:

That all lands containing the minerals kaolin, kaolinite, fuller's earth, china clay, and ball clay within such parts of Indian reservations as have heretofore been opened to settlement and entry under acts of Congress which did not authorize the disposal of such mineral lands shall be open to exploration and purchase and be disposed of under the general provisions of the mining and coal-land laws of the United States, and the proceeds arising therefrom shall be deposited in the Treasury for the same purpose for which the proceeds arising from the disposal of other lands within the reservation in which such mineral-bearing lands are located were deposited: Provided, That the same person, association, or corporation shall not locate or enter more than one claim, not exceeding 160 acres in area, hereunder: Provided further, That none of the lands or mineral deposits the disposal of which is herein provided for shall be disposed of at less price than that fixed by the applicable mining or coal-land laws, and in no instance at less than their appraised value for agricultural purposes.

Mr. GRONNA. I wish to ask the Senator from South Dakota if this money will be credited to the fund of the Indians or returned to the Treasury?

Mr. STERLING. It was the understanding that it would be credited to the Indian fund. The Senator will observe that the language is—

> The proceeds arising therefrom shall be deposited in the Treasury for the same purpose for which the proceeds arising from the disposal of other lands within the reservation in which such mineral-bearing lands are located were deposited.

I understand that all such proceeds are credited to the Indian fund.

Mr. GRONNA. I have no objection if it goes to the credit of the Indian fund.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I offer an amendment to the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add a new section, to be known as section 2, at the end of the bill, as follows:

> SEC. 2. That all lands reserved as timberlands or for other purposes within diminished Indian reservations shall be open to mineral entry and location under the mining laws of the United States: Provided, That upon every producing mine developed thereon the Secretary of the Interior shall levy and collect a reasonable royalty at a rate to be fixed by him, the proceeds thereof to be paid into the tribal funds of the Indians for whose benefit such reservation was made.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Do I understand that that applies to the past as well as the present Indian reservations?

Mr. POINDEXTER. It applies to any diminished Indian reservation, I assume, lands which have been reserved and not allotted and not open for entry. It authorizes mineral locations upon those reserve lands.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does it apply to what had been a reservation but is not a reservation at the present time?

Mr. POINDEXTER. No; it does not. I do not know that the Senator and myself have the same condition in view. It applies to reservations which have been opened for entry but in which a portion has been reserved from entry. It allows mineral locations to be made upon that reserve portion. They are called diminished Indian reservations.

Mr. SHAFROTH. For instance, we have in the State of Colorado a reservation called the Ute Reservation. It is not a reservation now. Under a treaty with the United States Government the Indians vacated the land, but under a provision that a certain amount of money per acre—I think a dollar and a quarter an acre—shall be given to the Indians for every acre that is located under any of the acts of Congress. What I want to know is whether this would be applicable to such a reservation?

Mr. POINDEXTER. If it is still a reservation, it would be applicable to it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does the amendment apply to all mining or just to the mining of the particular minerals specified in the bill?

Mr. POINDEXTER. It applies to all minerals.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I shall have to object to a provision applicable to all minerals to be tacked on a bill which has been introduced for the purpose of disposing of certain lands containing kaolin, kaolinite, and fuller's earth. The bill evidently has no relation whatever to gold and silver bearing lands that are located under the general mining law. It seems to me to convert a bill of that kind into a bill for a general royalty system on all the gold and silver mines is something we ought not to undertake.

The amendment also says:

> Provided, That upon every producing mine developed thereon the Secretary of the Interior shall levy and collect a reasonable royalty at a rate to be fixed by him, the proceeds thereof to be paid into the tribal funds of the Indians for whose benefit said reservation was made.

It seems to me that to a measure of such great importance we ought not to tack a general royalty bill for gold and silver mines. This bill was brought in here by the Public Lands Committee solely and purely for the purpose of regulating the entry of a certain kind of mineral land that is not gold or silver or lead or zinc bearing.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes, sir.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. If this amendment is permitted to go on the bill, you will find this to be the result: When the Secretary of the Interior shall so desire they can extend an Indian reservation ad libitum; they can extend it over any mining country they please, and the minute they do it and throw it back on the public domain the Secretary of the Interior would then begin to charge royalty upon the mining lands of the United States.

Further, it was never designed that any reservation of which I have ever known should take in anything except possible agricultural land. There are instances where these laws have been extended over Indian reservations, but I can find no law under which anyone to-day can not go on an Indian reservation and locate a mining claim if the mineral is there to locate. Now, when you get into an Indian reservation it is proposed to cut that out, and instead of turning the mine under the old mining law back to the public you put it immediately under the department and charge a royalty on the mining itself. To me it is utterly objectionable.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will yield in just a moment.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I think I have the floor.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I have no objection, of course, to the matter being fully discussed.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not wish to interfere with anything the Senator from Washington may have to say, but I understood my colleague to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I have the floor, Mr. President.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will ask who has the floor?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Washington has the floor.

Mr. SHAFROTH. All right.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I only wanted to express the hope that the Senators who have stated their objection to this amendment upon further consideration would not press their objection. This amendment is opening up to mineral entry a considerable area of public land that is not open to mineral entry at all now.

Senators object to a provision for royalty to be paid to the Indians. That does not involve the principal question. That could be voted upon by a motion to strike out the proviso, and the principal question could then be submitted.

I myself think that where mineral entries are allowed upon lands which have been reserved exclusively for the Indians, lands which belong to the Indians and upon which white people have no right of mineral location at present, if Congress authorizes mineral locations upon them, it is just and proper that some consideration should be paid to the Indians when mines turn out to be productive and profitable. I have not the slightest idea that the Secretary of the Interior would ever levy an unreasonable payment upon such mines. If he did, it is in the discretion of Congress at any time to limit his authority or to revoke it altogether or to enact a new rule in that regard.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The Senator presupposes what is not a fact, and that is that an executive reservation gives the Indians any title whatever to mineral lands. It leaves the lands the property of the United States. Time and time again it has been so held and so treated by actually taking the Indians off the particular reservation, giving them other land, and cutting the quantity down in one case, extending it in another. The Indian never had a right under an executive reservation and never could get a right under existing law in such a reservation to any mineral lands.

Mr. POINDEXTER. This amendment would not cover any such reservation as that. It applies to diminished Indian reservations which have been established by treaty between the United States and the Indians, whether recognized by Executive order or proclamation.

I do not care to go and I do not think that it is practicable at all to go into a discussion of the fundamental title to Indian reservations, but I will say in passing that the treaties between the United States and the Indians were based upon the assumption that the Indians were the possessors of certain portions of the country, and by treaty with the United States they granted to the United States that country and reserved to the Indian tribes a certain specified area.

The amendment could not possibly apply to any such conditions as described by the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. There is no question but that the Senator is correct in either a treaty or, if you please, a congressional Indian reservation. But now I have a concrete case in mind that makes me object to this amendment. On the Parker Indian Reservation, in my own State, there is a vast amount of agricultural land given to the Indians—at least, an Executive order creating it a reservation. That has been extended from time to time, until the last extension, not many years ago, took in the barren mountain sides, with mines already occupied, and from that day to this those men have been contending that they have a title to those mines. If that reservation shall be lessened, as it will be if we ever succeed in getting water on it, as we hope we may, then those very mines that the men have occupied, some of them since 1865, would be subject to the rules laid down in the Senator's amendment. It is absolutely unjust, not only to them but to any other mountainous barren country that has been spread over by an Executive order reservation for the purpose of taking in the mines themselves. Such cases as that exist in many parts of the country.

I have no doubt in my own State conditions exist where the mineral lands of the United States by general law, differing from all other lands in the United States, are held by a peculiar title, and for the purpose of encouraging mining as much as possible.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will yield in just a moment.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. One word more, and I shall not disturb the Senator further. Under the operation of this amendment and without the Senator's amendment, as I will show, if that reservation is reduced in size, it will, of course, leave out the barren mountainous district and keep the agricultural lands. In that event, the miners who have been there, the owners and claimants of those mines, will have an unquestioned right to go on under the general mining law as they did before the reservation was made. But under the Senator's amendment they have to commence paying royalty to people who never had title to the land and who under the law could not get title to mineral lands.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I decline to yield.

Mr. MYERS. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I rose to a point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Connecticut will state his point of order.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I object to the further consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill goes over.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill, notwithstanding the objection.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I rise to another point of order. I do not do it out of any hostility to the bill or to any Senator, but I will state the point of order. It is, that no motion can be made to proceed to the consideration of the bill under Rule VIII. Rule VIII is for the consideration of unobjected bills upon the calendar, and debate on the part of Senators is limited to five minutes each. It is simply designed to get off the calendar bills to which no one has any objection. Controverted measures that take up half an hour or an hour are to be considered in another way. A motion can not be made to proceed under Rule VIII to the consideration of a bill after an objection has been made.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is not of the opinion that the point of order is well taken under Rule VIII, because the rule specifically provides that—

At the conclusion of the morning business for each day, unless upon motion the Senate shall at any time otherwise order, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the Calendar of Bills and Resolutions, and continue such consideration until 2 o'clock.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, allow me to say that Rule VIII applies after the morning business has been concluded. Upon page 9, Rule VII discusses what shall be the morning business. Rule VII provides, in clause 3, on page 10, that—

Until the morning business shall have been concluded, and so announced from the Chair, or until the hour of 1 o'clock has arrived, no motion to proceed to the consideration of any bill, resolution, report of a committee, or other subject upon the calendar shall be entertained by the Presiding Officer, unless by unanimous consent; and if such consent be given the motion shall not be subject to amendment, and shall be decided without debate upon the merits of the subject proposed to be taken up.

That is—if the Chair will bear with me until I can state my point of order—that is morning business. Clause 3 of Rule VII distinctly states:

Until the morning business shall have concluded, and so announced from the Chair—

That may be done as in morning business; and up to 1 o'clock, as in morning business, any Senator may move to proceed to the consideration of a bill if he gets unanimous consent for the Chair to entertain it; but the Chair can not entertain the motion except by the Senator previously getting unanimous consent; and that is morning business which is set aside. The clause of Rule VIII we are now proceeding under provides:

At the conclusion of the morning business for each day, unless upon motion the Senate shall at any time otherwise order—

The Senate has not otherwise ordered; and we are now acting under the regular order and the standing rules of the Senate.

the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the Calendar of Bills and Resolutions, and continue such consideration until 2 o'clock; and bills and resolutions that are not objected to shall be taken up in their order, and each Senator shall be entitled to speak once and for five minutes only upon any question; and the objection may be interposed at any stage of the proceedings, but upon motion the Senate may continue such consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is just what the motion is.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If no objection is made—the Senate may continue such consideration; and this order shall commence immediately after the call for "concurrent and other resolutions."

The continuing of consideration is an entirely different thing from moving to proceed to the consideration of a bill under that rule which says that it shall be only for unobjected cases. So I make the point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has already ruled this morning that, until the hour of 1 o'clock has arrived, although the morning business has been concluded, no motion to proceed to the consideration of a bill was in order, but after 1 o'clock the Chair is of the opinion that, upon motion and until the hour of 2 o'clock, the Senate may consider any bill upon the calendar, and the Chair has so ruled. That motion is not debatable. There can be an appeal taken from the decision of the Chair, if it is not satisfactory.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. What motion is not debatable, Mr. President?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion to proceed to the consideration of a bill.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I respectfully appeal from the ruling of the Chair, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Then the question is——

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, may I say just a word on that point?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has not the slightest objection to any Senator saying anything that he pleases.

Mr. SMOOT. If we are going to vote upon the question, I should like to say just a word about it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, that would lead to further debate. If the Senator from Utah speaks upon one side of the question, other Senators should have a right to speak upon the other side. I make the point of order——

Mr. SMOOT. Then I shall not ask the privilege of speaking.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the ruling of the Chair be sustained? [Putting the question.] The ayes seem to have it. The ayes have it. The question now is, Will the Senate proceed with the further consideration of the bill? [Putting the question.] The noes have it, and the calendar will be proceeded with.

THE REPUBLIC COAL CO.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, the hour of 1 o'clock having more than passed, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate joint resolution 41, relative to the Republic Coal Co.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Montana. [Putting the question.] The noes have it.

Mr. MYERS. I call for the yeas and nays, Mr. President.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. MYERS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Johnson	Owen	Smith, S. C.
Borah	Jones	Perkins	Smoot
Brandegee	La Follette	Pittman	Stephenson
Bristow	Lane	Poindexter	Sterling
Bryan	Lea, Tenn.	Pomerene	Sutherland
Burleigh	Lee, Md.	Ransdell	Swanson
Catron	Lewis	Reed	Thomas
Chamberlain	McCumber	Saulsbury	Thompson
Chilton	Martine, N. J.	Shafroth	Tillman
Clapp	Myers	Sheppard	Townsend
Clark, Wyo.	Nelson	Sherman	Vardaman
Dillingham	Norris	Shields	Walsh
Fall	O'Gorman	Smith, Ariz.	Weeks
Gallinger	Oliver	Smith, Ga.	West
James	Overman	Smith, Md.	Works

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. PAGE] has been called from the city on important business. I make this announcement for the day.

Mr. THOMPSON (when Mr. ROBINSON's name was called). I am requested to announce the unavoidable absence of the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and to state that he is paired with the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]. I make this announcement for the day.

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY] and of the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN].

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. MYERS. I renew my demand for the yeas and nays on my motion, Mr. President.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I make the point of order against the motion of the Senator from Montana.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will be compelled to sustain the point of order. The Chair rules that the call for the yeas and nays was not seconded, and until there has been intervening business the Chair believes that the ruling must stand.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, there has been a call for a quorum since that decision of the Chair. Is not that intervening business?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not intervening business.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I make the point of order also that the Senator is moving to take up a bill out of its order on the calendar. The Senate is now proceeding under Rule VIII, which provides:

At the conclusion of the morning business for each day, unless upon motion the Senate shall at any time otherwise order—

And the Senate has not otherwise ordered—

the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the Calendar of Bills and Resolutions, and continue such consideration until 2 o'clock; and bills and resolutions that are not objected to shall be taken up in their order, and each Senator shall be entitled to speak once, and for five minutes only, upon any question; and the objection may be interposed at any stage of the proceedings, but upon motion the Senate may continue such consideration; and this order shall commence immediately after the call for "concurrent and other resolutions," and shall take precedence of the unfinished business and other special orders.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has already ruled.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Chair has not ruled at all on this point of order I am now making, if the Chair will allow me.

The VICE PRESIDENT. As to what is the Senator from Connecticut making a point of order?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator from Connecticut is now making the point of order that the motion of the Senator from Montana to take up a bill that has not been reached on the calendar is not in order under Rule VIII simply because the hour of 1 o'clock has arrived.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has already ruled that the Senator from Montana is not in order, and the Chair does not understand to what the point of order is directed.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I call for the regular order, Mr. President.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Chair ruled that the motion of the Senator from Montana was not in order on a point of order that I had not raised, and I should like to have a ruling upon this point of order.

Mr. SHEPPARD (and others). Regular order!

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will proceed with the call of the calendar.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. My inquiry is whether a motion is now in order to take up a bill upon the calendar other than the one pending in order?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is of the opinion that a motion is in order to take up any bill on the calendar except the one which was voted down by the Senate some time since, when the Senator from Montana moved to proceed to its consideration.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Well, Mr. President, I will not appeal from the ruling of the Chair, but I do not agree with it.

TELEGRAMS OF SENATORS.

The resolution (S. Res. 156) limiting the expenditures for telegrams sent or received by Senators was announced as the next business on the calendar.

Mr. MYERS. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be passed over.

THE REPUBLIC COAL CO.

The SECRETARY. Calendar No. 109, Senate resolution 84——

Mr. MYERS. Other business having intervened, I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 85, being the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 41) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to sell or lease certain public lands to the Republic Coal Co., a corporation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Montana. [Putting the question.] The Chair is in doubt, and will again put the question. Those in favor of the motion will say "aye," and those opposed "no." By the sound the noes seem to have it.

Mr. MYERS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] and vote "yea."

Mr. OVERMAN (when the name of Mr. SIMMONS was called). I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. SIMMONS] is absent on account of sickness and is paired with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP].

Mr. TOWNSEND (when the name of Mr. SMITH of Michigan was called). The senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] is absent on important business. He is paired with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. This announcement may stand for the day.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] to the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and vote "yea."

Mr. LEA of Tennessee. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD] to my colleague [Mr. SHIELDS] and vote "yea."

Mr. JAMES. I desire to inquire if the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed that he has not.

Mr. JAMES. I have a general pair with that Senator, which I will transfer to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES], and vote "yea."

Mr. BANKHEAD (after having voted in the negative). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] and will permit my vote to stand.

Mr. WARREN. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], so that he may stand paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH], and I will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I wish again to announce the absence on necessary business of my colleague [Mr. PAGE] and to say that he stands paired by transfer with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE].

Mr. POINDEXTER. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] is necessarily absent and is paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS].

Mr. WALSH (after having voted in the affirmative). I desire to inquire if the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed he has not.

Mr. WALSH. Then I desire to announce that I have a pair with that Senator, which I transfer to the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee. I see that my colleague [Mr. SHIELDS] has entered the Chamber and voted. I therefore withdraw the announcement of the transfer of my pair to him. Instead I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD] to the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. THORNTON] and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. JAMES. As the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] has entered the Chamber and voted, I will withdraw my vote and allow the announcement of my pair with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] to stand.

Mr. STERLING. I am requested to announce the absence of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS]. He is paired with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT].

The result was announced—yeas 41, nays 16, as follows:

So the motion of Mr. MYERS was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 41) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to sell or lease certain public lands to the Republic Coal Co., a corporation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] to the amendment of the committee, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 6, after the word "Interior" and before the comma, it is proposed to insert "at a figure not less than the appraised price."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Montana also offers another amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add, after line 14, on page 3, a new section, to be numbered section 2, which has been heretofore read to the Senate.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I voted to take up this bill. I did so in order that the Senators from Montana might have an opportunity to have the bill considered. I am, however, opposed to certain provisions of the bill. I am not in favor of directing the Secretary of the Interior to sell this property to this coal company.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a minute?

Mr. GRONNA. I yield.

Mr. MYERS. What I wish to say is this: The question is now coming up on a couple of amendments offered by my colleague [Mr. WALSH]. I heartily approve those amendments. I think they are very wise and beneficial. If the amendments should be adopted, the bill itself would be before the Senate for acceptance or defeat as it stood.

The Senator from North Dakota is evidently seeking to oppose the bill itself. I will ask the Senator from North Dakota if he would just as soon let the amendments offered by my colleague be disposed of, and then, if they are adopted, let us see in what sort of shape the bill is going to go to the Senate; and then, if he opposes it, speak against the bill. I simply ask if he would as soon let that procedure be followed? If so, it would simplify matters.

Mr. GRONNA. I am not opposed to the bill if properly amended.

Mr. MYERS. Then, I ask whether the Senator will let the amendments be voted on first, and then see if he thinks the bill meets with his approval, or oppose it, as he sees fit.

Mr. GRONNA. I simply wanted to be permitted to present my amendments.

Mr. MYERS. Oh, the Senator is going to offer amendments? Then I withdraw any suggestion of that sort, Mr. President.

Mr. GRONNA. I am in favor of empowering or authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to lease this land to this coal company, and I offer as an amendment——

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is an amendment pending.

Mr. GRONNA. As my amendment is to strike out, I believe it would have preference.

The VICE PRESIDENT. To strike out and insert?

Mr. GRONNA. To strike out and insert.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Very well.

Mr. GRONNA. I move to strike out, on page 2, line 20, the words after the comma "and directed," and to insert after the word "authorized" the word "and," and to insert after the word "sell" the words "or lease," so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to sell or lease to the Republic Coal Co.—

And so forth.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator if he intends to follow that up with other amendments to the bill. If the words "or lease" are put in there, there will have to be some direction or provision in relation to leasing, as there was in the original bill. I simply ask the Senator if he intends to follow this amendment with other amendments?

Mr. GRONNA. That was my intention.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, there is already an amendment before the Senate, and I think that amendment ought to be acted upon before the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota is considered. I think that would be the proper parliamentary procedure.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. GRONNA. I do.

Mr. KENYON. I will suggest to the Senator from North Dakota, why not vote on the amendments suggested by the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] and dispose of those, and then take up these other amendments? The amendments of the Senator from Montana will certainly help this bill; and for my part, I shall vote for his amendments and then vote against the bill.

Mr. GRONNA. I have no objection to that, if it is so desired.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendments of the Senator from Montana.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Montana to a provision in the bill as reported to the Senate, for it seems to me there is an inconsistency between the bill as reported and his amendment, if adopted. I call his attention to page 3 of the bill, beginning on line 7:

And upon payment thereof—

That is, upon payment of the price that is fixed upon the coal land—

the said Secretary shall issue to said corporation a contract providing the terms and conditions of said sale.

In connection with that, I wish to call the Senator's attention to his amendment and see if in his opinion there is not an inconsistency. His amendment provides that—

Any right or title acquired by the said Republic Coal Co. under the provisions of this act shall terminate and be forfeited—

And then he enumerates the causes. It seems to me that would be a limitation on the Secretary of the Interior. If the original bill passed as reported to the Senate, the Secretary of the Interior would have full power to provide the terms and conditions of sale. That power may include all that is provided in the Senator's amendment, and more, too. It seems to me the Senator's amendment is a limitation upon the power of the Secretary of the Interior. I ask him if, in his opinion, that would be the effect?

Mr. WALSH. Not at all. I do not take the same view of the bill as it reads as that expressed by the Senator from Utah. Under the terms of the bill I do not think the Secretary of the Interior would be authorized or empowered to impose any conditions whatever. This bill provides for the sale of the coal at the price fixed.

Mr. SMOOT. It also provides that he "shall issue to said corporation a contract providing the terms and conditions of said sale."

Mr. WALSH. But there are no conditions prescribed; and it certainly was not the intention that the Secretary of the Interior should be permitted to make just exactly such conditions as he saw fit. Indeed, if I may add this statement, it was my purpose to limit the power of the Secretary of the Interior. Whatever other conditions he might care to insert—and, in my view, he would not be authorized to insert any at all—I desire that he shall be thus limited, and that, regardless of what he may desire with respect to the matter, no sale shall be made except upon the condition there prescribed.

I may add, however, that under the bill as it is drawn I do not believe the Secretary would have any authority whatever to insert any conditions other than the bill itself prescribes, namely, the payment of the purchase price as fixed by the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that that was not the impression of certain members of the committee, at least. The way I look at it is that the bill gives the Secretary of the Interior full power to impose conditions in the sale under the bill as it is reported from the Senate; but if we adopt the amendment of the Senator, it seems to me it will in a degree, at least, limit the power the Secretary may have.

Mr. WALSH. If I may say a word further, I am very sure that no one upon reading the bill, except the Senator from Utah, ought to arrive at that conclusion, because it expressly provides that the Secretary of the Interior is authorized, empowered, and directed to sell this coal at a fixed price. That is all he is required to do. Having sold the coal at a fixed price, he is then required to execute a contract reciting the conditions under which the sale is made. He would not be authorized to put in any other conditions.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator, then, why were these words put in here at all? If the condition is simply the price of the coal, then why say that there should be a contract? Why not transfer the title or patent to the land directly to the coal company?

Mr. WALSH. I will say to the Senator that in my view the words are not apt. Furthermore, the word "contract" does not seem to me to be apt at all, because this bill contemplates an absolute sale of the coal to the Republic Coal Co. and the absolute payment by the Republic Coal Co. of the price of that coal. That becomes an executed contract and a transfer of the title. The word "contract" as well as the word "conditions" seems to me quite inappropriate to the procedure already outlined in the bill. Regardless of that, however, a sale is sometimes spoken of as an executed contract; so that the word "contract" may be all right, although not particularly appropriate.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator must admit that in all of these special acts of Congress, wherever a sale or a grant is made, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to issue a patent. If there is to be nothing more than a direct sale of this coal land to the coal company by the Government, it seems to me the bill ought to be amended and say so. In that case the words "shall issue to said corporation a contract providing the terms and conditions of said sale" should not be in the bill, but it should read "that the said Secretary of the Interior shall issue the said company a patent for said land."

Mr. WALSH. Not for the land, but for the coal.

Mr. SMOOT. For the coal, then.

Mr. WALSH. That would be entirely consistent with what goes before. What is there is entirely inconsistent, if it is to be given the construction given to it by the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. And if it is to be given the construction I place upon it, then the Senator's amendment would be inconsistent with this provision.

Mr. WALSH. No; not at all, Mr. President. I simply say that it would be entirely in harmony with the view of the Senator; only, instead of the Secretary having unlimited and unrestricted discretion, we impose upon him the obligation of putting these conditions in the contract.

Mr. SMOOT. All right.

INSPECTION AND GRADING OF GRAIN.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is Senate bill 120.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 120) to provide for the inspection and grading of grain entering into interstate commerce, and to secure uniformity in standards and classification of grain, and for other purposes.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President——

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, the Senate having voted to take up for consideration the coal-land measure, it is now pending before the Senate, and it can only be displaced by a vote of the Senate. This business that is on the calendar as the unfinished business can not be taken up without the consent of the Senate. The joint resolution which has been under consideration was taken up by motion. It did not come up in regular order. That joint resolution is under consideration, and while it is pending it can not be displaced except by a vote of the Senate. I make that point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair rules that the point of order is not well taken.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. Just a minute. Assuming that the joint resolution will not take very long, and that the Senator from Montana wants a vote on it, I ask that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. REED. I object.

Mr. BRANDEGEE (to Mr. McCUMBER). Ask unanimous consent.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. REED. I move to take up Senate joint resolution 41.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will not yield to any motion until this is disposed of. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. REED. There is objection. I made an objection before.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The unfinished business is before the Senate, and the Senator from North Dakota has the floor.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I move to take up Senate joint resolution 41.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have not yielded the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not.

Mr. REED. The Senator from North Dakota did not have the floor. The situation is this: The Senator from North Dakota asked unanimous consent, and failed to get it. That is what he rose for. I objected, and then made this motion, and the Senator from North Dakota can not by merely standing on the floor hold it indefinitely. The business for which he rose was transacted and concluded.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I asked recognition upon this bill, of course, and the Chair recognized me upon the unfinished business, and until I have yielded I am asking to hold the floor and not to yield it. I think I have that right.

Mr. REED. I think not.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The request of the Senator from North Dakota was that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. McCUMBER. I asked that it be temporarily laid aside, but the Senator from Missouri objected to it.

Mr. REED. The request was made and laid before the Senate, and it was rejected. I then addressed the Chair, was recognized, and made a motion. Thereupon the Senator from North Dakota did as he did yesterday afternoon—he continued to stand on the floor, ready, evidently, to make another speech.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let us see what the RECORD discloses as to the unfinished business being temporarily laid aside. The Reporter will inform the Chair.

The Reporter read as follows:

Mr. McCUMBER. Just a minute. Assuming that the joint resolution will not take very long and that the Senator from Montana wants a vote on it, I ask that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. REED. I object.

Mr. BRANDEGEE (to Mr. McCUMBER). Ask unanimous consent.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. REED. I move to take up Senate joint resolution 41.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will not yield to any motion until this is disposed of. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection. The Chair hears none.

Mr. REED. There is objection. I made an objection before.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The unfinished business is before the Senate, and the Senator from North Dakota has the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Dakota has the floor.

Mr. McCUMBER. There is a pending motion, I understand, to reconsider the vote by which this bill is the unfinished business. That is the first question, I understand, to be decided by the Chair or by the Senate itself.

Mr President, I wish at this time to make a parliamentary inquiry, and also to raise a point of order, and I want to state it so clearly that there can be no misunderstanding as to its meaning. When a Senator has the floor and is proceeding to debate a bill before the Senate and another Senator asks permission to interrupt, and the Senator having the floor says, "I yield to the Senator," does that entitle the Senator asking the privilege to hold the floor in his own right and make any motion for the disposition of the bill? Upon this point of order I ask the Chair to rule. Under the rules of the Senate and the record in this matter, is the motion of the Senator from Minnesota to reconsider the vote by which Senate bill 120 was made the unfinished business in order? I merely want to call the attention of the Chair to the RECORD. The unfinished business was laid before the Senate and I got the recognition of the Chair. The Senator from Minnesota then rose, and the following occurred:

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

That yielding, Mr. President, was a yielding for the purpose of a question or a suggestion. It is always understood by any Senator having the floor in discussion and debate that he will hold the floor until he surrenders it, and when a Senator asks leave to interrupt him it is understood and is the constant practice under the Senate rules that he does not thereby yield to him for the purpose of making a motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is of opinion that the point of order is not debatable.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am trying to present the point of order. Then I will call attention to this. The Senator from Minnesota then proceeded to make his statement, and while I was waiting for him to make his statement to me he said:

Therefore, in view of these facts, Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which last evening the bill was taken from the calendar and made the unfinished business. I think I am entitled to have the motion prevail as a matter of fairness and justice to me.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Do I understand that the Senator from North Dakota has made a point of order?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has.

Mr. REED. Upon what question is he making the point of order. There is no motion now before the Senate. The bill of the Senator is supposed to be before the Senate. There is nothing else.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is a pending motion.

Mr. REED. The Senator has not yielded the floor so that the motion can be put before the Senate, and it has not been stated to the Senate. If the motion had been stated to the Senate and the Senator then rose to make a point of order, he might do so; but he is making a point of order when the motion has not been laid before the Senate. I want to have the motion laid before the Senate, and when that is done there will be time enough to make points of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The RECORD discloses in this particular matter that the Senator from North Dakota upon yesterday had the floor. He yielded the floor to the Senator from Minnesota. The Senator from Minnesota moved to reconsider the vote whereby this bill became the unfinished business of the Senate. The Chair understands that the Senator from North Dakota is raising the point of order that when he yielded the floor he did not yield it for that purpose, and the Chair——

Mr. McCUMBER. May I correct my own position?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. My position is that when I say to a Senator, "I yield," it does not mean that I yield the floor, but that I simply give him an opportunity to ask me a question or to make a suggestion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. And not to introduce a motion of this kind?

Mr. McCUMBER. Not to introduce a motion. My contention is that I did not yield the floor by allowing the Senator from Minnesota to interrupt me.

Mr. REED. The point I am trying to advance is this. Conceding the RECORD to be exactly as the Vice President states it, and I think he undoubtedly states the RECORD accurately, that was the situation when we adjourned last night. That motion is not before the Senate until the Chair states it to the Senate. When the Chair has stated it to the Senate the Senator from North Dakota or any other Senator can make any point of order he desires. But as we are now proceeding, the Senator took the floor upon his bill, and still holding the floor upon his bill, proceeded to make a point of order against a motion that has not been laid before the Senate. I insist that the Senator must resume his seat, if he is to make that point of order, and let the Chair state the motion put by the Senator from Minnesota, and then the Senator can make his point of order against it.

Mr. McCUMBER. My point of order is that I had not yielded the floor to the Senator from Minnesota for the purpose of making that motion.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. I rise, Mr. President, to a parliamentary inquiry. My only anxiety is to have the procedure of the Senate go along properly, as the Chair desires it to go along. I submit this observation for the benefit of the Senator from North Dakota. Rule XIII provides that a motion to reconsider can be made at any time within two days. If a Senator might hold the floor for that length of time a motion to reconsider could not be made, and it would be a very easy way absolutely to prevent a motion to reconsider. So I think that a Senator might well, at some time during the day, insist upon the privilege to make a motion to reconsider before the time expired, as provided by Rule XIII.

Mr. McCUMBER. When we adjourn and meet again morning business and other business intervene, so that the Senator having the floor can not occupy it day by day. There is plenty of opportunity for a Senator to be recognized for that purpose.

Mr. President, to bring the question right to the point, can a Senator, by asking for permission to interrupt, immediately take the Senator holding the floor off the floor by a motion?

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the Senate will agree with the Chair, the Chair is going to try to settle this matter amicably. The Chair believes that the RECORD fairly discloses the fact that the pending question is the motion of the Senator from Minnesota to reconsider. While not in the exact terms, it is fairly determinable from the RECORD that that is the motion which is pending. Against that motion the Senator from North Dakota is now stating his point of order under the RECORD as made upon yesterday. Rule VII of the rules of the Senate provides that—

> It shall not be in order to interrupt a Senator having the floor for the purpose of introducing any memorial, petition, report of a committee, resolution, or bill. It shall be the duty of the Chair to enforce this rule without any point of order hereunder being made by a Senator.

What the word "resolution" means the Chair at one time would be able to say and at another time the Chair would not be able to say, because whether it is a resolution or whether it is a motion and whether there is any difference between a resolution and a motion is hardly determinable from the lexicographers. A motion is declared to be a proposal or proposition formally submitted to a deliberative body with a view to its adoption. A resolution is defined to be a formal proposition before a deliberative body for adoption. There does not seem to be any difference, according to the lexicographers, between a motion and a resolution. But whether under the rules of the Senate and the understanding of Senators there is a difference, is a question which the Chair refuses to decide. Rule XIX provides that—

> No Senator shall interrupt another Senator in debate without his consent, and to obtain such consent he shall first address the Presiding Officer.

That the Senator from Minnesota did. The Senator from North Dakota yielded. Whether he yielded for the purpose of making this motion or not, or whether the rules of the Senate prevent an interruption for that purpose, the Chair refuses to decide, and he leaves it to the Senate to settle this point of order.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I desire to make only one further observation. I suggested that a Senator might hold the floor beyond two days and prevent a motion to reconsider. The Senator from North Dakota retorts that that could not well be done, inasmuch as we have morning business, and a Senator would have an opportunity to make the motion. But suppose the Senator from Minnesota did not undertake to make the motion yesterday and did undertake to make it to-day, the two days being about to expire, is it conceivable that he can be shut off from making the motion because a Senator holds the floor and will not yield for that purpose? It would absolutely invalidate Rule XIII, which gives a Senator the privilege to move to reconsider.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is not conceivable from the standpoint of the Chair, but for the purpose of determining this point of order the Chair submits it to the Senate.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. NELSON. I renew my motion. The Senator from North Dakota is not entitled to the floor now. He made a point of order, and then the Chair discussed it, and he is not debating the bill. He can not hold the floor continually or perpetually. I never heard of such a rule. I renew my motion.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am compelled to make a point of order against that now. There is a point of order now before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. A point of order is now before the Senate. The question is, Is the point of order well taken? Will the Senator from North Dakota send the point of order to the Secretary's desk?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Has not the motion been properly presented by the Senator from Minnesota now?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is ruling that while a point of order is pending before the Senate and undecided no other business is in order. The Secretary will state the point of order.

The SECRETARY. The point of order is raised that under the rules of the Senate and the record in this matter the motion of the Senator from Minnesota to reconsider the vote by which Senate bill No. 120 was made the unfinished business is not in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Is the point of order well taken? All in favor of it will say "aye."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senate may debate a point of order when it is submitted to it?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks the Senate may debate the point of order, although it is not debatable if the Chair rules upon it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. After the matter has been submitted to the Senate I assume it is debatable, so that Senators may give their reasons for voting one way or the other. On that theory, if I may be permitted, I simply wish to observe that it seems to me the point of order made by the Senator from North Dakota is well taken, and I shall so vote.

When a Senator has the floor, and a Senator rises, and the Chair says "Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Connecticut?" and he says he does, my understanding of it is that he is not yielding the floor; he is simply, in what we call senatorial courtesy, submitting to an interruption from me. If he wanted to be niggardly about his courtesy, he could catechize the Senator before yielding, if he has to cast an anchor to windward and anticipate any movements that he would not agree to if he knew what they were going to be, and say, "Well, before yielding to the Senator, I desire to know for what purpose he wants me to yield to him." But Senators are not suspicious of each other in that way. When a Senator rises to address the Chair, and the Chair says "Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Connecticut?" and the Senator from North Dakota says he does, the usual procedure then is for the Senator from Connecticut to ask a question, or to submit an observation, or ask to have something put into the RECORD in connection with the matter which the Senator who has the floor, who is in possession of it and has a right to it, is discussing.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I was going to ask the Senator for what purpose he wanted to interrupt me; but I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is the Senator's privilege.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. The two days are about to expire under which a motion to reconsider can be made. I will ask the Senator from Connecticut if he thinks the Senator from North Dakota can hold the floor all day and prevent a motion to reconsider, the time being about to expire, under Rule XIII.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not think he could hold it so that the rule could be enforced against the Senator who was precluded from exercising his privilege. Whether a notice could be given so that that motion could be made in the morning or at other times, I am not prepared to say. Whether there be any inconsistency between those two rules or not, when a Senator has been recognized by the Chair and has the floor and is making a speech on a subject, no one else has a right to the floor, it does seem to me that a Senator who rises and gets permission to interrupt the Senator who holds the floor can not make a motion to lay the bill upon the table, for instance, which cuts off all debate and leaves the Senator who has the floor helpless; and by his simply saying that he yielded, anticipating a question, he finds the matter upon which he prepared his speech swept from him, and it may be put upon the table without a chance to say a word. I do not think that is the effect of yielding.

If a Senator rose and said to me, when I had the floor, "Will the Senator yield to me to make a motion on this matter?" then, of course, I would say, "What motion does the Senator intend to make?" It may be I will yield and it may be I will not yield; but that a Senator rises and addresses the Chair in the middle of the speech of another Senator, and that Senator loses the right to continue it, I do not think is the effect when a Senator simply says that he yields to the Senator. There can be no hardship upon anybody by that interpretation of the doctrine, because it is only fair if a Senator is going to take the floor away by some motion, to say to the Senator, "Will the Senator yield to me to make a motion to adjourn?" or to make a motion to lay upon the table, or something of that kind. In this case, when the question simply was, "Does he yield to the Senator?" and he says he does, I think the point of order raised by the Senator from North Dakota is well taken.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Before the Senator takes his seat I should like to ask him a question. Does the Senator from Connecticut think that the making of a motion under such circumstances is a violation of any rule of the Senate?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not know of any rule that prohibits a Senator from making a motion if he has the floor for the purpose. If he has the floor, of course it is not a violation of any rule.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Chair called attention to Rule VII: "It shall not be in order to interrupt a Senator having the floor for the purpose of introducing any memorial, petition, report of a committee, resolution, or bill." Does the Senator think that making a motion of this character is the introduction of a resolution?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Oh, no, Mr. President; I do not base my theory that the point of order is well taken upon that rule.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Then there is not any standing rule of the Senate which interferes with its being done.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Only the rule that the Senator who has the floor has it, and the rule that it is necessary to have the floor in order to make a motion. If I rise and am recognized, I have the floor. Now, when another Senator rises and says "Mr. President," and the presiding officer says "Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Utah?" and I say "I do," the question is whether in yielding him the floor it gives him the right to make a motion. That is the question. I say it does not.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator thinks when a Senator is occupying the floor and upon request yields to a colleague, that he has not for the time being yielded the floor?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think that, exactly; and, if the Senator will pardon me, allow me to say why. The Senator who yields for a question, or in that way, without the Senator interrupting him stating for what purpose, and supposes it is for an interruption, in ninety-nine times out of a hundred does not take his seat. He stands as I am standing now, having the floor and yielding to the Senator from Idaho. When he says he yields, it is to see what the Senator is going to ask him, and he stands in his place, still holding physical possession of the floor.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia rose.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course, if the Senator from Georgia now says to me, "Does the Senator yield?" I am not yielding the floor. If I did, I would say "Certainly; I yield the floor," and sit down.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield for a question.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. He could stop the Senator from Georgia any time he saw fit.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. He does not yield the floor. He just permits an interruption and stops that interruption the moment he desires to stop it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes. The Chair just now asked "Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Georgia?" If I had said, "Mr. President, I do not desire to be interrupted at this time," the Chair would add, "The Senator from Connecticut declines to yield to the Senator from Georgia." The question is, in my opinion, almost too plain to argue.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do.

Mr. BORAH. The proposition may be stated, it seems to me, a little stronger than that. Suppose when the Senator from Georgia interrupted the Senator from Connecticut and the Senator from Connecticut yielded to him, the Senator from Connecticut can say, at any moment, "I yield further"; but the floor still belongs to the Senator from Connecticut; it is not a yielding of the floor; and, in my opinion, a Senator must have the floor in order to make a motion.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. Every day a Senator who has the floor may say to the Senator to whom he has yielded simply for a question, "Why, Mr. President, I can not yield further to the Senator; I did not yield to the Senator to make a speech; I do not want that put into the middle of my remarks; and I decline to be diverted. If the Senator will pardon me, I do not want to be discourteous, but I can not yield further." The distinction is as to whether a Senator merely yields for an interruption or whether he absolutely yields the floor. If a Senator yields the floor, he has no business to stand on it; his business is to take his seat. That is the way he shows he has yielded the floor. Nine Senators out of ten, when they finish their remarks and yield, do not even say that they yield the floor, but they simply resume their seats.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do.

Mr. TOWNSEND. In furtherance of the argument made by the Senator from Connecticut, I desire to call his attention to the fact that practically the same rules prevail in the other House which prevail here on this subject. The precedents will disclose many cases where the ruling has been against the right of a Member to make a motion in the time of the Member who has the floor, and such a motion has been ruled out of order time and time again. Certainly there would be great injustice done if any other rule were to prevail. While I do not wish to discuss the merits of the proposition, I wish to say that it seems to me that we can not now afford to establish a precedent of this kind, which would make it absolutely unwise and unsafe for any Member of this body to yield the floor for an interruption or for the purpose of letting in any light on the subject under discussion.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield the floor, Mr. President.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I only wish to say that I agree fully with the view presented by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] and the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND]. In this connection I wish to add that I think an opportunity ought to be given to present the motion of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], and I hope it will be afforded this afternoon——

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Just one moment. And that the sense of the Senate on the subject of this motion to reconsider shall be had. I think we ought to dissent from the view that the Senator from Minnesota has a right to inject a motion into the speech of the Senator from North Dakota; but he having done that, I think we ought to afford the opportunity to the Senator from Minnesota regularly to present his motion to reconsider and give the Senate an opportunity to vote upon it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I was going to suggest to the Senator from Georgia that I am making this fight as against the right of a Senator to take me off my feet and to take such methods of preventing a hearing upon this case. After the decision in the case I was intending, of my own volition, to say that I consented to a reconsideration of the motion, so that we may take the matter up immediately and thereby dispose of it, so that no claim can be made that I was attempting in any way to take any advantage in the matter.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, on yesterday I stated it as my opinion that the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] was not entitled to make the motion which he did make in the time of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER]. I have not changed my opinion. The only motive I had in making the suggestion I made a moment ago was that an opportunity should be given to the Senator to make the motion at some time before the two days expired; and I am glad the Senator from North Dakota, without controversy, is going to permit that to be done. That is the contention I wanted to make in the matter.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I desire to call attention, upon the point of order pending, to a precedent which seems to me to be very closely related to the present situation. This occurred on May 20, 1908, in the Sixtieth Congress, first session:

During the consideration of the conference report on H. R. 21871, "to amend the national banking laws," Mr. LA FOLLETTE raised a question as to the presence of a quorum.

Mr. Aldrich raised a question of order, viz, that a Senator must be in the possession of the floor, and that he can not take the floor by asking to make a parliamentary inquiry and then make any motion.

The Vice President (Mr. Fairbanks) sustained the question of order. Mr. LA FOLLETTE appealed.

Mr. Aldrich moved to lay the appeal on the table, and on a division the yeas were 32, nays 14, no quorum voting.

The Vice President (Mr. Fairbanks) counted the Senate and announced that a quorum was present, and so the motion prevailed. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, pp. 7158, 7159.)

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, lest anything I said in the brief colloquy I had with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] might be misconstrued, I desire to say that I agree entirely with the position taken by the Senator from Connecticut and the position taken by other Senators. My only purpose in interrupting the Senator from Connecticut was to indicate, so far as I was concerned, that I did not think that Rule VII, which was referred to by the Chair, had anything to do with the question, and I did not want to have my vote upon it construed as either an affirmation or a negation of the proposition laid down in Rule VII. I do not think a motion of this kind can be said to fall within the operation of that rule at all.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair desires to say that that was read with a view that, if the Chair had believed it was a resolution, it would have been the duty of the Chair to have sustained the motion without any suggestion from any Senator. The question is, Is the point of order well taken? [Putting the question.] The ayes have it, and the point of order is sustained.

Mr. NELSON. I now renew my motion to reconsider the vote by which Senate bill 120 was made the unfinished business. As I understand, that motion is not debatable.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I think it is debatable under the rule, but I do not care to debate it. I want to say, having charge of the bill referred to, that I consent to a reconsideration of the vote by which it was made the unfinished business, so that we may get a vote directly as to whether we shall proceed with its consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Minnesota to reconsider the vote by which the bill referred to by him was made the unfinished business. [Putting the question.] The ayes have it, and the vote is reconsidered.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Regular order, Mr. President!

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I move to take up Senate joint resolution No. 41.

Mr. McCUMBER. I make the point of order that the pending motion now is, Shall the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 120?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is compelled to sustain the point of order. The motion to reconsider simply put the question back to the original motion made by the Senator from North Dakota to proceed to the consideration of the bill referred to by him.

Mr. REED. I move, as a substitute for the pending motion, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate joint resolution 41.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will be compelled to decide that under the rule a motion to take up a certain bill is not amendable. The question is, Will the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 120?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, is that motion debatable?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not debatable.

Mr. GALLINGER. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think such a motion is debatable after 2 o'clock; but I am willing to accept the decision of the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks a motion to take up a bill is not debatable. The question is on the motion of the Senator from North Dakota to take up Senate bill 120.

Mr. McCUMBER. I call for a division.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 15, noes 13; no quorum voting.

Mr. REED. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No quorum has voted. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Hughes	Overman	Sterling
Borah	Johnson	Perkins	Sutherland
Brady	Jones	Poindexter	Swanson

Mr. WEEKS. My colleague [Mr. LODGE] is absent on account of important business. He has a general pair with the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH]. I should like to have that statement stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-three Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The question is, Will the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 120? [Putting the question.] The ayes seem to have it.

Mr. REED. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE], I reannounce the transfer of that pair to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE], and vote "yea."

Mr. BRADLEY. I am paired with the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN]. I inquire whether he has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed that he has not voted.

Mr. BRADLEY. Then I withhold my vote. Were I at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. BANKHEAD. I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] and vote "nay."

I am requested to announce that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] is paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE].

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion is agreed to, and the Chair lays before the Senate Senate bill 120, the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 120) to provide for the inspection and grading of grain entering into interstate commerce, and to secure uniformity in the standards and classification of grain, and for other purposes.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, for the purpose of allowing the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] to conclude the consideration of the joint resolution which he called up some time ago and the consideration of which, I think, can be finished this afternoon, I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. SMOOT. Regular order, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. What is the pleasure of the Senate of the United States?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of bills on the calendar.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I thought I heard the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] say that he agreed to lay aside the unfinished business temporarily, in order that the Senate might proceed to the consideration of Senate joint resolution 41. Am I correct?

Mr. McCUMBER. Of course, I can not dictate what the Senate shall take up after the unfinished business is temporarily laid aside, but I understood the Senator from Montana wanted to go on with his joint resolution.

Mr. MYERS. I thank the Senator very much, and I appreciate the opportunity, if I can have it.

Mr. McCUMBER. I therefore asked that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside for that purpose. Of course, I can not dictate what business the Senate shall take up.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if the Senator from Montana will now make a motion, of course the Senate can decide whether or not it will take up the joint resolution he has in charge.

THE REPUBLIC COAL CO.

Mr. MYERS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of order of business No. 85, being the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 41) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to sell or lease certain public lands to the Republic Coal Co., a corporation.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I withdraw my motion, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS].

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, is that the joint resolution which the Senator from Montana has been urging?

Mr. MYERS. It is.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is the Republic Coal Co. resolution.

Mr. MYERS. It is calendar No. 85, Senate joint resolution 41.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 41) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to sell or lease certain public lands to the Republic Coal Co., a corporation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. JONES. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Does the fact that the joint resolution of the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] has been taken up on motion displace the unfinished business?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It undoubtedly does.

Mr. SMOOT. That is, if the consideration of the joint resolution is not concluded before the adjournment of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the consideration of the joint resolution is not concluded before the adjournment of the Senate, it takes the place of the unfinished business under the rules of the Senate.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I did not understand the ruling of the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair was announcing that there was no unfinished business before the Senate and the joint resolution, having been taken up on motion, if it be not concluded before the Senate adjourns, it becomes the unfinished business of the Senate.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I do not understand that to be the case where the unfinished business has been temporarily laid aside for the purpose of considering another measure. I want to be corrected if I am in error, but I understand that Senate bill 120 will resume its place as the unfinished business when Senate joint resolution 41 is disposed of.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Dakota must understand that there is no unfinished business. The motion to reconsider was agreed to, and the bill was removed from its status as the unfinished business and placed back on the calendar. Thereupon, on motion of the Senator from North Dakota, the bill was laid before the Senate, which does not give it any right as unfinished business, unless it be the last matter considered to-day.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I understand that when it was laid before the Senate it became the unfinished business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; it must be the last matter which is considered on the day.

Mr. GRONNA. I ask that Senate bill 120 be read in full.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, that bill is not now before the Senate.

Mr. GRONNA. I ask to have Senate bill 120 read in full.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The matter before the Senate is Senate joint resolution 41, which has been laid before the Senate by order of the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President. Supposing that Senate joint resolution 41 is passed this afternoon, then under the unanimous consent, granted on the request of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], that Senate bill 120 be temporarily laid aside, that bill would become the unfinished business, providing there was no other bill taken up before adjournment to-day?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Undoubtedly; but the Chair thinks, if the consideration of the joint resolution continues until the Senate adjourns and it is not disposed of and Senate bill 120 is not taken up, the joint resolution becomes the unfinished business. Senate joint resolution 41 is before the Senate, and the question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], which has been heretofore stated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is in the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to further amendment.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, were there not two distinct amendments offered by my colleague?

The VICE PRESIDENT. One amendment has heretofore been agreed to as in Committee of the Whole this afternoon.

Mr. GRONNA. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the committee as amended has been agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the vote by which the committee amendment as amended was agreed to is reconsidered. The Senator from North Dakota proposes the following amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, in the committee amendment, on line 20, it is proposed, after the word "authorized," to strike out the comma and insert the word "and"; after the word "empowered" to strike out the comma and the words "and directed"; and after the words "to sell," on the same line, to insert the words "or lease," so that if amended it will read:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to sell or lease to the Republic Coal Co.—

And so forth.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I desire to be heard on the amendment.

This is evidently an effort, in a bill which provides for the sale of certain lands, to inject by this amendment the doctrine of leasing these lands, and thus establishing a precedent for the leasing of any lands which the Government owns. To that I am opposed.

If there is anything against which my State has pronounced, it is the doctrine of the National Government leasing the public domain. That protest is founded upon the principle that it is an interference with what properly belongs to the State.

Under our system of government it is provided that the National Government shall have control of national affairs and the State governments shall control local affairs. There never was an intention on the part of the framers of our Constitution that a single acre of land should be held in perpetuity by the National Government except for governmental purposes alone, such as for military, naval, and post-office uses. It is inconsistent with the very theory of our Government that there should be a leasing of lands by the National Government. It is inconsistent, because by the terms of the enabling act under which each State has been admitted into the Union the State is without power to levy any taxes upon that land until disposed of by the Government. For that reason holding public lands by the Government in perpetuity saps the very foundation upon which the State is dependent to maintain government. "You take my house when you take the prop which doth sustain my house."

Colorado was admitted into the Union under an enabling act which provided that "the State, when formed, shall be admitted into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatsoever."

GOVERNMENT LACKS MORAL RIGHT.

With that language in the enabling act I should like to know whence is derived the moral right of the Government to hold in perpetuity land which the State government must tax in order to maintain its government, especially when the Nation has never deprived any of the States east of the Rocky Mountains of the power to tax lands within their respective borders. At the time of the admission of Colorado into the Union no power existed in the President or any other officer permanently to withdraw lands from entry or location, either for agricultural, grazing, mining, timber, stone, or coal purposes. The laws providing for disposition of the public domain had been fixed for years, and no officer was vested with power to change those laws. The fact that all the laws provided for settlement, location, development, and improvement of all the public lands and did not provide for the Government retaining any part thereof, except for governmental uses, shows conclusively that the policy was intended to be fixed in favor of the disposition of the lands as against the perpetual ownership of the same by the Government. That fixed policy and the language of the enabling act, in my judgment, constitute an implied contract between the parties which the Federal Government can not in good faith violate.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do.

Mr. FALL. I understand that the Senator is objecting to the amendment. Does not the Senator's objection lie to the language of the entire bill with the provision as it is, that the Secretary of the Interior is to make a contract providing the terms and conditions of sale? In other words, as I understand, the Senator is objecting to such reservations in regard to this property as will prevent the levying of taxes by the State for the purpose of raising revenue.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes, sir.

Mr. FALL. It strikes me that objection lies to the whole bill as much as it would if the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota were adopted.

COLORADO ASKS ONLY SAME TREATMENT ACCORDED OLDER STATES.

Mr. SHAFROTH. If that is true, I am against the whole bill; but I did not understand that the bill contained any such provision. I am utterly opposed to leasing the public domain. I should like to know in which one of the thirteen original States the National Government held in perpetuity any lands. When States have been subsequently admitted into the Union under a stipulation that they shall be admitted upon an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatsoever, is it fair, by process of withdrawing lands from entry and establishing a leasing system which means perpetual ownership of the lands, to withhold them from taxation by the States?

When we look at the policy of this Government from its very foundation we will realize that none of the lands were excepted or reserved in perpetuity in the original thirteen States, and in justice and in fair dealing the same rule should prevail as to every other State. Take the States that were admitted into the Union after that time—the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois—was there any governmental reservation there? Was there any exception in the general clause under which they were admitted? Not at all. You can search in vain to find a reservation upon the part of the Government, or even a proposition by the Government, to lease lands and then hold them in perpetuity.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I simply wanted to remark, if the Senator will allow me, that the Government owns and leases or disposes of lands as it sees fit in practically every State of the Union.

Mr. SHAFROTH. When has it done that?

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is constantly doing it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, yes; I know; but this policy which has been invoked is not with the sanction of law. It has been done in violation of law and contrary to the rights of the people of the Rocky Mountain States.

When we come to Missouri and to Kansas, we find the same principle prevailing. Their natural resources were not subject to perpetual ownership upon the part of the National Government. Nothing of that kind was suggested in those days.

Here was an established policy that whenever a State was admitted into the Union it should have the same rights as the States originally forming the Union. We find no exceptions to that policy until we get to that region which was the hardest of settlement, which Daniel Webster said was "that region of savages and wild beasts, of deserts, of shifting sands and whirling wind, of dust, of cactus and prairie dogs." Yet when citizens get to that land, instead of the Government showing that tender care which it should have exercised to the extent at least of granting equal rights with the original States, we find it does not give those rights, but proposes to hold in perpetuity lands which should be the subject of taxation for governmental purposes.

POWERS, IF CARRIED TO EXTREME, MIGHT ANNIHILATE STATE.

If the United States Government wants to hold land as its own for other than governmental purposes, it ought to subject itself in the ownership of that land to exactly the same terms to which a private citizen subjects himself when he acquires land in a State, namely, let it be subject to taxation. If it will not do that, it might create a condition, as you can see, where in an extreme case it might annihilate a State. The power to exempt from taxation like the power of taxation can become the instrument of annihilation.

Suppose 99 per cent of the territory of a State should be withdrawn from entry and should be held by the Government in perpetuity under a policy of leasing. I ask you, How could the State maintain local government?

It may be said that we got our lands cheap under the homestead act. Mr. President, the people of the United States got their land everywhere under similar acts. If you will examine the deeds that are on record in the New England States, you will find that the consideration named in the deeds was a peppercorn or a penny, and that was all the consideration that was actually paid. The object was to bring about the settlement, the development of the land. Under that policy of permitting settlement for the purpose of developing the land there has come a prosperity and wealth in this Nation that never has been equaled in the history of the world. Yet are we going to overthrow that policy by which the United States has grown to be the greatest Nation on earth, under which there has been a development in the mining industry unparalleled anywhere, into a system of leasing and a system of administration from Washington, 2,000 miles away from where the lands are located? Is it possible that we are going to treat these Western States as mere possessions of the United States?

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes, sir; I yield.

Mr. BRYAN. Does the Senator from Colorado think the States have any rights that the General Government is bound to respect?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do. I think, at least, that they have those rights until a constitutional amendment is adopted which shall take away those rights. I believe in the Constitution, and I believe when the Constitution determines a matter of that kind it is proper that every State should adhere to it. Until the Constitution does divest us of that right, which the people of the United States, in the formation of this Government, intended should be ours, and which, under the policy of the Government for years and years was ours, it seems to me it is unfair to take it away.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am in entire sympathy with the plan of doing anything and everything we can legally and constitutionally do for the newer States. If, however, the United States should lease this land or any other land, would it not then become subject to taxation and the State derive a revenue from it?

Mr. SHAFROTH. No, sir; it would not.

Mr. GALLINGER. It would not?

Mr. SHAFROTH. No, sir. The wording of the enabling act is substantially that these lands, until disposed of by the United States Government, shall be exempt from taxation.

Mr. GALLINGER. That language is in the enabling act of the State of Colorado?

Mr. SHAFROTH. It is in the enabling act admitting our State, and I think it is in the act admitting every State in the Union.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then I am in still greater sympathy with the position of the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I thank the Senator.

THE POLICY NOT TO HOLD THE PUBLIC DOMAIN IN PERPETUITY FIXED BEFORE THE ADMISSION OF COLORADO AS A STATE.

Mr. President, this policy of not holding lands in perpetuity was in force at the time Colorado was admitted into the Union and at the time Montana was admitted into the Union. It has been the policy ever since the formation of the Republic that the Government should not own lands in perpetuity, but should dispose of them for the purpose of building up a citizenship and a wealth from private enterprise that would produce great development of the resources of the country, and the Nation permitted such States as Illinois, Indiana, Missouri, and Kansas to have the benefit of their own resources so that they could become subject to taxation upon the part of the State.

EXEMPTION FROM TAXATION OF THE PUBLIC DOMAIN, IN EFFECT, COMPELS THE TAXPAYERS TO PAY FOR THE LANDS EVERY 30 YEARS.

What is the serious feature of this exemption from taxation? Why, in my part of the country the taxes upon land, with reasonable interest on each yearly payment, amount every 30 years to the full value of the land. You require the State to maintain government over these very lands which the Government withholds and withdraws. If the State has to maintain a State government, a county government, and a school government over them, and yet is not permitted to collect any taxes, what does it mean?

It means, Mr. President, that the people who hold property there that is subject to taxation must pay taxes for the maintenance of government not only over their own property but over all of these lands. It means that those people in the West indirectly pay for this land every 30 years; and yet, under a policy of perpetual ownership upon the part of the Government, they never get to own a foot of the same. Is that right?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. As I understand the matter, then, the Government takes the revenue from these lands when they are leased?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes, sir; from coal lands.

Mr. GALLINGER. The State gets nothing, but the State is put to the expense of policing and protecting this property, I suppose, belonging to the Government?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, yes. Now, it may be that hereafter some bills will be introduced for the purpose of giving to the States some portion of the revenue. I do not know. When that matter comes up it will be a subject for consideration at that time. I do not like the leasing system at all, however.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes, sir.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Under the law, as it exists now, a large percentage of the revenues of these reservations is paid to the counties in which they are respectively located. In a great number of instances the proceeds derived in this way from the sale of timber and other things upon the reservations amount to more than the taxes upon the land would amount to.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not think so.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do.

Mr. FALL. I should like to ask the Senator for one instance of the character he mentions, if he can cite it. I should like to ask him, also, if it is not a fact that after deriving all the revenue that it possibly can derive from the people of the immediate locality, and turning back to them 25 per cent of the money that they themselves have paid for the use of the public domain, at every session of Congress every single reserve comes here and asks for an appropriation from the taxpayers of the United States with which to support that reserve in addition to what it derives from the people themselves, 25 per cent of which it graciously pays back to them?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado further yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I only want to answer the question of the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Very well; if it is brief, I have no objection.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator mixes two very different things. The complaint which the Senator from Colorado is making is that the people of the State where the lands are located are deprived of revenue.

Mr. FALL. They are.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Now, the Senator from New Mexico is complaining that the people of other States are subjected to a burden for taking care of that land. That is an entirely different proposition. I wish to say that the benefits of the appropriations which the people of the United States make for roads, to establish telegraph and telephone lines, to patrol and protect from fire the reservations in the several States, go to the benefit of the people in the vicinity where those reservations are located. The people who get the benefit of the reservations are the people living in the vicinity of the reservations.

As to the other specific question asked by the Senator from New Mexico, there are counties, such as Bonner County in Idaho and Pend Oreille County in the State of Washington, which derive more from portions of forest reserves located in those counties than they would if the ordinary rate of assessment of similar lands were applied to them and the ordinary rate of taxes collected from them. The same thing is true of other counties in the State of Washington. On the other hand, there are counties in the State of Washington more than three-fourths of whose area is owned by lumber companies, who pay a very inferior rate of taxes, with whom the counties are in continual controversy in regard to the collection of taxes, who refuse to sell their lands, who shut out settlers from all of that area, withholding it from development and refusing to pay their just share of taxes, allowing the taxes, after having reduced the assessments, to accumulate from year to year, and then seeking a compromise, which is always advantageous for them.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado further yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes; I will yield to the Senator. I should like to aswer the proposition of the Senator from Washington right here, though.

Mr. FALL. I would, too, if I could ever get him down to a proposition.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Go ahead.

Mr. FALL. The Senator says that certain counties derive revenue from the forest reserves. From whence is that revenue obtained, except from the people of that locality who use the forest reserves? The great Government of the United States is giving you nothing. It is what your own people, in your own locality, in your own State, have paid in for the preservation of the Government reserves; and you get back 25 per cent of the money which your local people pay in, not outsiders. Then, to make up the difference, to make up the 25 per cent—in fact, to make up 100 per cent of the difference—they come here every year and secure from Congress an appropriation for the support of that very reserve. So the people of the United States, instead of benefiting by these reserves, are taxed to support them; and the people of the locality, instead of being benefited, are merely getting back for public roads and other improvements 25 per cent of the money which they themselves pay into the Treasury for the support of a lot of so-called experts who simply extinguish fires and do work of that sort.

PARALLEL IN TAXATION LEVIED UPON THE COLONIES.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] has said that the counties in which some of these reserves are located get a benefit from the United States Government far greater than that which would result from taxation. I wish to say to the Senator that, even if that were true, there would be no right on the part of the Federal Government to determine where these moneys should be spent in the State. You must remember that although in the very act which imposed duties upon the people of the colonies by Great Britain it was provided that they should be expended in the interest of America and for its defense, yet America took the position that England could not impose a limit as to where these moneys should be expended in the colonies. So, in the western part of the country, where the National Government says, "We will let you have 25 per cent of the receipts of the Forestry Service there provided you spend that money in a certain way," it is going beyond what is fair and right. If these States are to be considered as States of the Union, they should determine for themselves where the money shall be used.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SHAFROTH. In just a moment. I want to answer a little more specifically the question of the Senator from Washington, and then I will yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

The Senator from Washington says, however, that we get a revenue nearly or fully equal to the amount that would be received if the land were taxed. Why, Mr. President, when we look at what is done in our State I can demonstrate beyond the peradventure of a doubt that we could not get one-tenth of the amount we would realize in taxes. There have been reserved from entry in our State 7,881,923 acres of coal lands until reclassified, and when reclassified such high values were placed upon them that the total amounted to about half a billion dollars. Here is half a billion dollars' worth of property practically withdrawn from entry, and the Senator from North Dakota would like to have it subject to a leasing system and a perpetual ownership upon the part of the Government.

The idea of a State such as Colorado being subject to an exemption of $500,000,000 of taxable property! Why, Mr. President, the tax on that property would be ten times the amount that could ever be realized by the State from contributions from the leasing system of the Government, and no contributions of the rentals are yet made by the Government to our State.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I now yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish to ask the Senator if it has not been the continuous policy and understanding of this Government in relation to these States, from the beginning of the Government, that the public lands in the several States were to be held by the Government in trust for the States and for no other purpose? That being the understanding of the States when we formed the Union, is it not a clear violation of every purpose and policy of this Government now to say: "We will deprive the States, the cestui que trust of these lands, from their benefit"?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I thank the Senator for his statement. I have dwelt upon that matter to some extent, and it is absolutely true.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. SHAFROTH. In a moment.

UNBROKEN PRECEDENT UNTIL ROCKY MOUNTAIN STATES WERE REACHED.

Mr. SHAFROTH. In a moment.

So far as Colorado is concerned, we were not admitted into the Union until this policy was long established. Not only was it true as to the original thirteen Colonies, afterwards admitted as States, in which no resource of those States was ever attempted to be interfered with by the National Government, but the whole line of States extending from Maine to the Rocky Mountains was treated in the same way. Illinois does not have to surrender 10 cents a ton for its coal. What does it amount to? What does it amount to in my State, for instance?

According to the Geological Survey report, made down here in Washington, there are 371,000,000,000 tons of coal in Colorado. Suppose a tax of 10 cents a ton is imposed upon that. What does it mean that the people of Colorado will have to pay? What is 10 cents a ton on 371,000,000,000 tons of coal? It means ultimately that they will have to pay $37,000,000,000. That is what it means.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado now yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Not at present; in just a moment. I want to develop this matter for just a moment. There will be imposed upon the people of the State of Colorado ultimately a charge of $37,000,000,000, ten times the amount of the national debt at the close of the Civil War, and that is on the basis of only 10 cents a ton. Is it right? Did Illinois have to pay any such thing as that? Did Ohio have to pay any such amount? Did any of these other States have to pay it? Is it fair now, when you come to the more distant States, to the States that were hardest to settle, to the States that absolutely put to the test the courage and devotion of the pioneers of the country, to have this imposed upon them?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Not yet; in a moment, Mr. President.

NATION NOT ENTITLED TO INCREASE OF VALUES CREATED BY THE PEOPLE OF A STATE.

It may be said that the Government is getting, and should get, the increase in the value of these coal lands. I deny it. I say that the coal lands have been made valuable by the people of the States in which they are located. Why? Because the coal lands stood there for 6,000 years and did not advance one penny in value in all that time. It was the development and settlement of that part of the country that gave these lands value.

Mr. President, the idea that the National Government should claim for itself the increase in the value of these coal lands as against the State is the most audacious claim that could be made. I want to give an illustration right now in my own State of coal lands that are going to develop. We have a railroad winding a tortuous route up through the mountains, called the Moffat Road. It was built by Mr. Moffat, a citizen of Colorado and of Denver. It is up to a point where it is necessary, in order to bring the coal over from its western terminus to Denver, that there should be a tunnel constructed through the main range of mountains. The people of the city of Denver have recently voted to guarantee $3,000,000 for the construction of that tunnel. That spirit of enterprise is making those coal lands there very valuable now.

Why is it that the Government, instead of keeping the price at which the lands could be bought at $10 an acre when that road was begun seven or eight years ago, raised them to $40, $50, $60, or $100 an acre? Who is gathering the unearned increment? The people of the State of Colorado are those who are developing the country. They are building the railroad. The city of Denver is putting up the money for the very tunnel that will bring that coal through. Yet the National Government is taking advantage of the enterprise which is developing those coal lands. Nobody wanted them at $10 an acre for 20 or 30 years. Yet after the road is started there comes a readjustment of the values and the values are fixed at a high rate.

There have been some coal-land areas in my State of a value as high as $400 an acre, every dollar of which, and the increase of which, really belongs to the people of that State.

Now, Mr. President, is it possible that it is fair that the National Government should enter upon a leasing system and take the revenue? I care not what they do with it, even if they put it at the disposal of the State, but this amendment provides that it shall go into the hands of the Federal Treasury. That is what the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota proposes. Consequently when that is done it is absolutely depriving the State of its means of support so essential to a republican form of government.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes, sir.

Mr. GRONNA. If the land of which the Senator now speaks, which is now so valuable, is sold to a corporation, is it not true that that money goes to the Government of the United States?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, yes; that is true. I do not think it ought to go there. I think that justice and fairness require that it should go to the State. Take this very road. I do not know which road it is. Is it the Milwaukee or the North Western?

Mr. NORRIS. The Milwaukee.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Take the Milwaukee road as an illustration, and see what people should have the benefit of any increase. Suppose this was land worth $500 an acre, what has made that land valuable? What has made that coal marketable? It lay there for 6,000 years and nobody took it up. It lay there for 50 years at $10 an acre and nobody took it up.

What made that land valuable? That road was constructed up there. The people of the State have to support that road. The people of the State have to contribute to it, and it is supposed that the products of the land contiguous thereto will maintain the road.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. SHAFROTH. It is the people of the State who should have the benefit arising from any increase in the value of the land.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes, sir.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I wish to ask the Senator a question. There are two sides to the proposition the Senator states. I should like to ask him who made the railroad valuable?

Mr. SHAFROTH. There is not any doubt but that ultimately the people who reside there and who have to contribute in the payment of freight rates and passenger rates, but that road was really the foundation of it all, and it is the people of the State who have to contribute. It is the people of the State and not the people of Maine or the people of Massachusetts who are entitled to any benefit from it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to ask the Senator a further question at that point. Are not those people citizens of the United States and deriving some benefit at least from being so?

COLORADO HEAVY CONTRIBUTOR TO COAST DEFENSE AND MILITARY MAINTENANCE.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, yes; and I want to tell the Senator that the State of Colorado pays to the National Treasury three times as much money every year as it collects for its own State government. It pays to the National Government $5,000,000 every year, part of which goes for your battleships. We do not have any fear of a foreign navy coming to Colorado. We do not have any rivers and harbors there, yet we contribute to the same. The State pays its share for fortifications upon the coasts and we do not need any fortifications in Colorado. No foreign army in the world could ever penetrate to the Rocky Mountains. Yet we contribute to these expenditures. We contribute to these harbor improvements; we contribute our proportion to the battleships; we contribute our proportion to the fortifications. We think it is just and it is right to do that. But when we do it is unfair to make us contribute to those expenditures and then say we will deprive your State of the privileges we extended to all the older and richer States of the Union. We will not sell our lands, but hold them in perpetuity and thereby deprive the State of the power of taxation as to the same; we will have a leasing system; we will forfeit the leases when we want; we will increase the rentals whenever we want to do it; and, worst of all, we will have an administration of these lands 2,000 miles away from them.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Colorado yield further to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to ask the Senator if he advocates turning over to the States all the public domain?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I have never advocated that.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It seems to me, Mr. President, that that is the logical outcome of the Senator's argument.

Mr. SHAFROTH. As between a leasing system by the National Government and turning the lands over to the States, the latter is a hundred times better; yes, infinitely better.

Mr. POINDEXTER. If the Senator will allow me a moment further, I should like to suggest to him that there are some benefits which come to the citizens of the United States outside of naval vessels and river and harbor improvements. The Federal Government has various activities entirely apart from the public lands in the State of Colorado. It maintains courts, it maintains officials of various kinds, the Federal laws are applicable there and the people of Colorado are living under the protection of those laws.

If the Senator advocates, as a great many do who take his side of this question, the abandonment on the part of the Federal Government of the entire public domain, turning it over to the States, there is such a radical difference between his point of view and mine that it is perfectly useless for us to discuss this question. But I should like to point out to him, in this connection, that so far as the people of the States are concerned and their relation to the public reservations, while the people of Colorado, or some of them, are opposing the retention by the Federal Government as reserves of public lands which it already owns and for which it has not to pay anything, the people of other States are soliciting the Federal Government to acquire reserves in their borders and to spend millions out of the Public Treasury to pay for them.

Mr. SHAFROTH. If any State wants them, let them have them. You will get sick of it, I tell you.

Mr. President, I want to say, with relation to the question of State ownership of these lands, it was almost recognized by the Government at one time that it would cede the lands if the States wanted them. The State of Texas kept its own land. The National Government never owned a foot of land in the State of Texas unless it went there and bought it and paid for it and used it for a military reserve or for a post office, and then it was necessary to get a legislative act of the State conferring jurisdiction upon the United States. It was the recognized policy that these lands belonged to the people of the United States who would settle upon them.

A man has a right to locate a gold-mining claim in Colorado if he is a citizen of any State in the Union, and he does not even have to go upon it or personally work it. It can all be done for him by others. This is also true as to other kinds of claims. On a homestead, of course, the entryman must reside on it. It is purely, as its name indicates, a public domain for settlement by citizens of the United States.

PREVENT MONOPOLY BY STATE LEGISLATION.

Mr. President, when the Senator speaks of the fact that there are great corporations in his State, I hope that there will be laws enacted which will prevent monopoly. You can not bring a proposition to me that will not meet my approval if it will have a tendency to prevent monopoly. There is no question but that there have been some abuses, but because there have been some is no reason why a State government should be deprived of those means of collecting revenue for its own treasury and for the maintenance of its own institutions.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield further to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do not want the Senator to misunderstand my position. I am not objecting to the presence of great corporations in the State. I realize that it is necessary that there should be great corporations if our resources are to be developed. What I said was really in reference to the Senator's position that if these lands under such laws as exist for reservation are retained by the Federal Government it deprives the State of revenue. I only cited the fact that by comparison from what I know of my own knowledge in my own State, as between those lands which the Federal Government has retained and those lands which have been opened for acquirement as the Senator advocates, either under the State laws or by private individuals from the Federal Government, in some counties more than three-fourths of the entire area has gone into the hands of lumber syndicates and others, and the State does not derive an adequate revenue from the lands which those lumber syndicates hold.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Then it is because of the State's fault in not assessing the land. It has a perfect right to do it, and sooner or later the people will compel proper assessments.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That may or may not be true, because the comparative power and influence of such corporations in dealing with the State government and in depriving the State government of the proper revenues constitutes one of the principal arguments that the Federal Government should retain its power to see that these lands are preserved for general use and not for private monopoly.

ADMINISTRATION UNDER NATIONAL GOVERNMENT SHOWS MANY ABUSES.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I want to protest against the supposed virtue of the Federal Government in handling the public lands. I want to cite to the Senator from Washington the fact that there is a record of the United States in both the Senate and the House which, if it had been presented against any State, would have been cause almost of dissolution, if such a penalty could have been imposed. There were 43 railroad grants donated by Congress, aggregating an area of 155,000,000 acres of land. Do you realize the extent of territory embraced in 155,000,000 acres of land? Its extent is equal to the area of Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Rhode Island, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, and Virginia.

Senators talk about the National Government being so efficient and so free from those evils of administration that it can take care of these lands so much better than the States. I deny it. I say that experience does not show it to be true, and the very fact that these land grants were made is proof of the assertion to the contrary.

It is the same old assumption that the monarch always makes, that he can control and dispose of things better than any of his subjects, and who thinks that whenever his subjects under a democratic form of government exercise rights it is nothing but anarchy and socialism.

Ah, Mr. President, the position of the gentleman is absolutely unfounded, in view of the experience which we have had in the United States. Where is there a State that has squandered its lands in such a way as has this Government? Where is there a State that has disposed of them in such a reckless way as the Federal Government?

It is human nature that the people interested in the lands, who see them and occupy them and who know that State revenues have to be raised from them, are going to take care of those lands much better than the National Government.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes, sir.

Mr. BORAH. As I understand the Senator's position with reference to dealing with these natural resources, coal lands, and so forth, which are within the States, it is that the people of the States know better what to do with those things than the people who are far away?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes, sir.

Mr. BORAH. In other words, that the State government and the people of the State are better fitted to take care of them than the National Government?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Undoubtedly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Is this the Senator who yesterday introduced a proposed amendment to the Constitution that when 8 per cent of the voters of a State vote for woman suffrage the National Government shall compel them to act upon it, whether they want to do it or not?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes, sir; and whenever you get a constitutional amendment even taking away our lands, and the people of the United States to the extent of three-fourths of the States vote for it, I must say that my loyalty to the Union will still exist; but you can not do that by an enactment of legislation and get me to consent that it is right.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. BRYAN. By what process of reasoning does the Senator come to the conclusion that the people of Colorado are better qualified upon their own affairs than the people of the United States at Washington?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I come to the conclusion that that is a fact because I believe it is a fact, except perhaps only in those cases which involve the question of human liberty.

Mr. BRYAN. Or woman suffrage?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes; or woman suffrage, if you may so term it. You may say what you please about it, but, as a matter of fact, it is a question involving human liberty and human freedom. That has nothing to do with this question, however; but if the Senator wants the answer, he is entitled to it, and he can make out of it what he pleases. I have not attempted to force by an act of Congress upon the people of Florida the question of woman suffrage.

Mr. BRYAN. Oh, Mr. President, that is exactly what the Senator is trying to do.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, no; I have attempted to do it by a constitutional amendment, and the safeguards that exist in behalf of your State exist by reason of the fact that it takes two-thirds of the Senators, two-thirds of the Representatives, and three-fourths of the States. Whenever any person is deprived of human rights in the United States, and it is recognized by a constitutional amendment, every State, in my judgment, should bow to it and acknowledge it.

Mr. BRYAN. I want to ask the Senator——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield further to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do.

Mr. BRYAN. If three-fourths of the States represented in Congress come to the conclusion that the lands in Colorado should be taken out from under the jurisdiction of the State of Colorado, does the Senator think they had any moral right to do that?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I would say I think it bad policy.

Mr. BRYAN. Would the Senator believe that it was a proper exercise of the rights of the Federal Government?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I recognize this, there are two schools of thought upon this question. One school is that the States can control this matter better than the National Government, and the other is that it can be done better by the National Government; and if that constitutional amendment were adopted I would bow to it. But I would not bow to it on a question of a majority of one vote either in the Senate or in the House.

Mr. BRYAN. Then it seems that the Senator from Colorado attends one school one day and the other school the other.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The Senator may think so, but it is the distinction between a constitutional amendment and the statute. Besides, what is applicable in a case involving human liberty and rights does not apply to a question of property rights.

Now, Mr. President, I want to go a little further into the statement relative to the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER].

FUNCTIONS OF NATIONAL AND STATE GOVERNMENTS DEFINED.

Under the formation of our Government we have a system by which the National Government is supposed to attend to national affairs and State governments to local affairs. The Nation and the States are in partnership in the matter of government. In view of that fact, the question arises as to the jurisdiction of each. The Federal Government has taken certain powers of taxation. Those powers are exercised as to revenues derived from customs, internal revenue, and income duties.

Mr. President, the States have been left to taxation directly upon property, personal and real, principally. The Federal Constitution has imposed upon the State a certain duty. That duty is that every State shall maintain a government republican in form. One of the means by which this is accomplished is to have a local government there, a State government. You must have a governor, a treasurer, an attorney general, and other State officers. In the aggregate the State officers must be numerous and the necessary expenditures great. Thus in the States of the Union there are 48 governors, 48 attorneys general, 48 auditors, 48 treasurers, 48 secretaries of state, 48 senates, 48 houses of representatives, and their large office forces.

HEAVY OBLIGATIONS IMPOSED UPON STATES.

This imposes upon the States great deal heavier obligations and more expense than that which exists in maintaining by the National Government one Chief Executive, one Senate, and one House of Representatives, one Cabinet, and their office forces.

But that is not all. In order to maintain this government you must have county governments, and they must be supported out of the revenue of the States. Those county governments provide for thousands of sheriffs, thousands of county treasurers, thousands of county auditors, thousands of school superintendents, and thousands of other officers, and their compensation must be paid by the people of the States.

In the division of revenues the National Government has by far the better of the bargain in taking its two or three sources of revenue and leaving the States to impose taxes upon property for the support of their governments.

But the greatest agency in maintaining a republican form of government is the public-school system, and the United States Government contributes very little to the same. The expense of maintaining a public-school system is enormous. In my State there are 5,200 teachers employed. The expenditures for the erection and maintenance of school buildings in Colorado aggregate millions and millions of dollars. Yet these expenditures are essential, because of the necessity for educating people to properly discharge the duties of citizenship. That is the reason. Is it not of as much importance to the Nation as to the State that the citizen should be intelligent? The National Government imposes upon the State the burden of maintaining the school system, of maintaining a county government, of maintaining a State government, requiring us to resort to lands for taxation, and then, as in my State, withdraw from entry 14,000,000 acres of land as forest reserves, 7,881,923 acres of coal land, having a valuation, according to the Interior Department, of at least $500,000,000. What kind of generosity is it upon the part of the parent Government when it imposes those burdens upon the State, so necessary to the maintenance of a republican form of Government, and yet prevents the State from raising the necessary revenue to support that government by holding in perpetuity such enormous areas exempt from taxation? If our government were unital, the National Government would have to provide all of these expenditures.

Is that fair? Is it just? Is it just, in view of the fact that in the general system that we have started every State in the Union east of the Rocky Mountain region was permitted to use its own resources, to tax every foot of land within its own dominion, with which to support these institutions so essential to a republican form of government?

BUREAUCRATIC ADMINISTRATION BOUND TO DEVELOP ABUSES.

Mr. President, one of the strongest objections to a leasing system by the Government is that it requires administration by a bureau in Washington. Bureaucratic control has not been good in the past. It can not be good in the future, no matter how well intending may be the officials. Out in my State 10 years ago there were set aside 16,000,000 acres of land as forest reserves. Forty per cent of that land lies above what is termed in Colorado the timber line, upon which no timber can grow. I think the acreage has been reduced now to about 14,000,000 acres, because I believe the present Secretary of the Interior has cut out about 2,000,000 acres of the reserves; but 40 per cent of it lies above timber line, and yet it is said to be a forest reservation.

That is the kind of administration which comes by reason of having Washington officials control. Would that mistake ever have been made by home administration? Oh, no. Yet that is exactly what a withdrawal of lands for a leasing system will promote. Thirty per cent of that 14,000,000 acres of land lies between the timber line and good timber. The intervening space is covered with scrub timber. You know that as you go up the mountain side the timber you first see is good and large and is merchantable. Then as you go higher the trees get smaller and become what is termed scrub timber. Thirty per cent of these reservations are nothing but scrub timber in my State and 40 per cent are above timber line. Thus of the reservations that were set aside in the State of Colorado about 10 years ago 70 per cent have no more connection with forestry than has that floor. And yet that is the kind of administration the conservationists think is good.

Mr. President, when you talk about administering affairs at Washington City over lands that are situated 2,000 miles away, you are putting into the hands of people who do not know and who can not know the situation, and consequently you can not get that good government that you do get by reason of having people who own the country and who are interested in the country build up that country.

LEASING SYSTEM LOGICALLY DEVELOPED WILL EMBRACE METALLIFEROUS MINES.

If you have the leasing system apply to coal mines, you are going to have it ultimately apply to gold and silver mines and to zinc and lead mines, and thus you will make a condition of affairs that will make us a province of the United States with a system of tenantry fastened upon us.

How does the withdrawal of these coal lands affect the people, irrespective of the amount that is paid in leasing?

MONOPOLY CREATED AND FOSTERED UNDER WITHDRAWAL SYSTEM.

Mr. President, about 10 years ago these coal lands were withdrawn from entry until reclassified, and on reclassification their values were placed so high that there have been very little coal lands entered since. There have been in the last year only 1,240 acres of coal lands taken up under the laws in the State of Colorado. What does it mean? What result does it have upon present conditions? Mr. President, it simply creates, in the coal companies that are now in existence and which have their lands patented, a monopoly. It means that new coal companies could not afford to give the high price fixed by the Government and compete with the old companies.

The result is that no coal lands in recent years have been taken up and consequently the coal companies which exist there necessarily have a monopoly of the business. In the last 10 years this condition has produced from a dollar to a dollar and a half a ton increase in the price of coal in the State of Colorado. What does that amount to? We dig from the mines of Colorado 10,000,000 tons of coal a year. That means that the people of Colorado, because of this policy, are compelled to pay $10,000,000 more each year—double even the amount that we pay to the National Treasury. Is that fair? Is that just? Is that the administration of the National Government which will give to the people of the Western States a great impetus in their work of development? No. It becomes an indirect tax upon every fireside to the extent of from one dollar to a dollar and a half a ton on coal, and it makes an amount in the gross of from ten to fifteen million dollars a year which our people are compelled to pay because of the high price which has been placed by the Government upon the coal lands in my State. Is that right? Is that fair?

The cry has been that this is done in order to prevent monopoly, and yet in the very doing of the thing there is created the monopoly. Can it be possible that that is wise administration? Do you think it would take place in the legislature of any State? If the legislature of a State were so recreant to its duty as to permit a monopoly of that kind, it would not be long until bills would be initiated by the people and just laws would be adopted by the people to wipe out the intolerable system. This whole theory that administration can be better directed from Washington than in the State where the lands are located is absolutely unfounded in human experience. A leasing system will require a continual inspection by officers appointed from Washington, which will always be as it always has been in the Forestry Service, irritating to our people. It will require innumerable inspectors at great cost to the Government.

THE WITHDRAWAL OF WATER-POWER SITES HAS PREVENTED THE DEVELOPMENT OF ELECTRICAL POWER.

Mr. President, the same policy seems to be recognized by the ultraconservationists as to water power. We find that the theory now is to lease the water powers of a State. First, these so-called conservationists appeared before committees of the Senate and insisted that the National Government owned the water, but when there was shown to them that not one but a half dozen Supreme Court decisions had determined that the people of the States owned the water, then they had to resort to a subterfuge. They whipped the devil around the stump by declaring that, "inasmuch as the United States Government owns the land through which this water runs, it will not grant any permits for the erection of a water-power plant on that land until an agreement is entered into to pay to the National Government a royalty of $1 per horsepower per annum. I think the amount was graduated until it got to $1 per horsepower a year.

What does that mean to the people of the State? It means that about $2,000,000 additional each year will be taken out of the State and turned over to the Federal Treasury when the water power is fully developed. Is that fair? Is it just? Was anything of that kind ever done to Ohio or to Indiana or to Illinois or to Missouri or to Kansas? Oh, no; they were entitled to their own resources and to the development thereof.

We find, Mr. President, that those waters are now going to waste, producing the same condition of retarded development with respect to them as exists in the case of coal lands because of the refusal to grant permits over the public domain for the erection of water-power plants. We have found that only a few such plants are now constructed; a permanent check has been laid against new construction, and thus these companies that are already in the field are in full possession of a complete monopoly. There is not the competition that we of the West are insisting should exist. Yet this deplorable condition is the natural result of administration from a place 2,000 miles from the point where the lands or the waters are located.

NATIONAL GOVERNMENT ATTEMPTING TO DO INDIRECTLY WHAT LAW FORBIDS DOING DIRECTLY.

Whenever the National Government says that it will prevent the use of the waters of a State by refusing to permit a power plant to be constructed it is doing indirectly what the law says it can not do directly. It is simply prohibiting without legal authority the State's use of its own waters and appropriating those waters for its own use and benefit. If the National Government wants to divide this money with the States, it might do it; or if it does not want to do it, it need not do it. I do not know what the provision is with relation to the water powers as to whether there is any division whatever. I think there is no division; but no matter what it is, if it is a division, it is part of that which is collected from the people of the State of Colorado. There can be no such thing as a monopoly in water power in a State, because they are all subject to the action of public-utility commissions, which regulate the charges which such companies can impose.

Mr. President, it seems to me that that is all wrong; it seems to me that it can not be defended upon any grounds of equity and fair dealing. We believe that a covenant was entered into when we entered the Union, by which we were to have the same rights as had the States which were originally incorporated into the Union; and we find that that policy was pursued for years and years, as to States, clear up to the line of the Rocky Mountain region, and there a halt was called which produced a stagnation in our whole western country.

The State of Colorado has few mining prospectors now; and why? It is because the prospector is not going to submit to the rules and regulations required in order to obtain patent on a mining claim in a forest reserve. First, when you want a patent to a piece of land for mining purposes, the Forestry Bureau sends out a man to look over the ground to see whether the land is taken up for an ulterior purpose. Then, if it passes him, there is an expert, so called, sent out to investigate the mine, to take assays, to determine whether it will likely be a pay mine. Why, Mr. President, that is an insult to every prospector and every miner, because the scientific man in the United States has been the one most grievously mistaken in the location of mining claims.

CRIPPLE CREEK A PHYSICAL CONTRADICTION OF GEOLOGISTS' THEORIES.

The whole geological profession turned down the proposition that there was any pay ore to be found in the Cripple Creek district; they said in that formation it was absolutely unknown in the history of geology that gold should be found there; and yet, Mr. President, we have taken out of that area more gold than has been taken out of any other camp in the entire United States. If we had had this system upon us then, and had one of those geological inspectors to come forward and say, "Gold can not be here; I will not approve patent for your mine; you must stop your work," what miner would have prospected under those conditions?

Mr. President, it seems to me that the wise system is to let these lands be taken up under general laws. The amount that the Government formerly charged for coal lands was $10 an acre if they were over 20 miles from a railroad and $20 if within that distance of the railroad. It was supposed that under the policy of permitting citizens to take up that land as soon as civilization advanced, as population increased, the people who were there would have cheap fuel for heating and cheap fuel for manufacturing. But when you go and increase the amount they must pay for these lands from $30 to $40, $50, $60, $100, $200, $300, or $400 an acre, it seems to me that it is grinding into the State a tyranny that should not be permitted. Let the Nation collect all the land is worth; but in order to give equal treatment to the West let the Nation deliver to the State to aid it in maintaining a republican form of government all excess over the old rates of $10 and $20 per acre.

This whole leasing system is wrong. If there are any people who are monopolizing anything, my cooperation can be had for any system that will stop it. If you want to put a limit as to the amount of coal land which any corporation can take up, it is all right; I am perfectly willing to do that. If you want to place in some other way a check upon them, a forfeiture to prevent interlocking directorates, all right and good; you could not adopt a system more satisfactory to me to prevent monopoly. But when you, by wholesale withdrawals of land, establish a system of perpetual ownership of the land, I say it is not wise; it is not good.

Mr. President, there was a justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, who recently died, who once made a declaration that every man should take to his mind and to his heart with relation to the public-land system of the United States. That declaration was to the effect that the National Government has certain duties to perform of a national character; that the States have certain duties to perform of a State character; that they are distinct and separate; and that they should be kept distinct and separate. He said:

> A National Government for national affairs and State governments for State affairs is the foundation rock upon which our institutions rest. Any serious departure from that principle would bring disaster upon the American system of free government.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, in offering the amendment now pending I thought that I was in sympathy with the expressed wishes of the people of the United States. It has not been very long ago since a campaign was made against the then President of the United States for disposing of coal lands, not to corporations, but to individuals, under the then existing law. It is only two years ago that we heard campaign orators denounce the Republican Party and the then President of the United States and a member of his Cabinet for doing something not so offensive as is proposed to be done under the provisions of this very bill, which provides for the disposition of certain coal lands to a corporation. Mr. Ballinger was condemned by the campaign orators for allowing citizens of the United States to take coal land under the existing laws; but, Mr. President, it seems now that the policy of those who made those campaign speeches has been reversed.

I have believed that the people of the United States stood committed to a policy of leasing the mineral lands of the United States. I was under the impression that when I offered this amendment it would be approved by the majority party, because they so vehemently denounced the party which was in the majority a year or two ago for the action it took concerning the coal lands on the public domain.

Mr. President, to a certain extent I am in sympathy with what the Senator from Colorado has said. I fully realize as much as he does that the people of a State must bear the burden of taxation; but if it were wrong under a Republican administration to permit individuals to acquire coal lands, it is equally wrong under a Democratic administration to permit corporations to acquire coal lands. When I offered this amendment I said that I proposed to follow it up with another amendment. I call the attention of the Senator from Colorado to an amendment which I propose to offer if the amendment offered by me and now pending is carried. The amendment I propose to offer is as follows:

> Provided, That one-half of the amount received by the Government as rental therefor shall be paid into the treasury of the State of Montana for the benefit of the public schools of that State.

I will ask the Senator from Colorado if he is opposed to the proposed amendment which I suggest if the pending amendment offered by me goes into the bill?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I am perfectly willing, if this land is sold, that the proceeds shall go to the public schools or be devoted to any other purpose. It would merely be a gift upon the part of the National Government, although a gift in equity, because the people in the State have made the value of the land; but as to the leasing system, I am opposed to it, no matter where the proceeds go, because it involves perpetual ownership on the part of the Federal Government and administration 2,000 miles away from where the lands are located.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. GRONNA. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to ask the Senator from Colorado what difference there is between perpetual ownership by the people of the United States acting through the National Government and perpetual ownership by the Anthracite Coal Trust?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I am opposed to the Coal Trust. What I want to get at is to crush the trust, if that be possible; and we are framing some bills now which I hope will have that effect.

I am perfectly willing to join in an effort to provide by law that no coal company shall ever be permitted to take an area of the land of the United States of more than, say, 5,000 acres. Under such a provision we could have in my State 450 competing companies, and that would be for the benefit of the consumer.

Mr. POINDEXTER. As to that, I will merely comment that it is very easy to make declarations against trusts and monopolies, but it is quite a different thing to put those declarations into effect.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That may be——

Mr. POINDEXTER. And if the Senator really is opposed to the Coal Trust and is willing to adopt effective methods to prevent them from exercising a monopoly, he should support the proposition of retaining the fee-simple title to the coal lands in the people of the United States. That will put a stop to the coal monopoly.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I do not believe in perpetual ownership in the Government. I believe that the ownership should be in individuals, and that they should be limited as to the amount that they may use. I do not believe in crippling a corporation; they should have a sufficient amount of coal lands to supply the communities which they do supply; but when it comes to the question of perpetual Government ownership and control of these lands I am opposed to it; it is contrary to the principles of our Government.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator from Colorado that this bill specifically provides that 1,020 acres, and no more, shall be leased to this corporation.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I am perfectly willing that only 1,900 acres shall be sold; but what I am objecting to is the leasing system.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I think I understand the Senator from Colorado. While I do not want to prolong this debate and do not want unnecessarily to take up the time of the Senate and delay the disposition of this bill, I can not help saying that I believe it my duty to call the attention of Senators to what was said from the platform by campaign speakers for the dominant party.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. GRONNA. I yield.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will say to the Senator that I do not know to what he refers; but, if he refers to the campaign in my State, he will find that nearly every orator who took the platform there condemned the policy of the Republican Party in setting aside forest reserves and coal lands. This very question was discussed, and there were ringing resolutions adopted in our State platform against it.

I took the position, further, that there were those in both political parties who were pursuing this policy, as evidenced by expressions and votes in the two Houses of Congress, and we condemned the policy of the Republican Party, at least the Democrats in my State did, upon the leasing system and upon the proposition of withdrawals.

Mr. GRONNA. Yes, Mr. President; and they condemned the Republican Party; they condemned the President of the United States and the then Secretary of the Interior for allowing Mr. Cunningham to acquire coal lands away up in Alaska.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. GRONNA. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH. I am very much interested in the declaration of the Senator from North Dakota, and I should like to understand in what platform the Democratic Party declared that the policy of the disposition of the lands in Alaska was wrong?

Mr. GRONNA. I will say to the Senator that I believe it was in the platform of the Democratic Party in the State which I in part have the honor to represent.

Mr. WALSH. Of course I am not able to speak with respect to that, Mr. President, but I should hardly think that the Senator would care to state that as the declaration of the opposite party.

Mr. GRONNA. No; I did not mean to say that, Mr. President. I do not now recollect that the Democratic Party committed itself to any policy as to the disposition of the public lands.

Mr. WALSH. I should like also to inquire of the Senator if he desires to have us understand that the Democratic Party at any time or in any platform declared in favor of the leasing system?

Mr. GRONNA. I have not so stated, Mr. President.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to his colleague?

Mr. GRONNA. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will not ask the Senator to yield to me; I thought he had finished. I will wait until he concludes.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, personally I have been committed to a policy of leasing the public lands of the United States containing minerals, rather than disposing of them by sale. I am not willing to say that any corporation, even under a lease, shall acquire as much as 5,000 acres of land. I have opposed that very idea for many years. We might create a monopoly under the leasing system, it is true, but the only way it could be done under that system would be by leasing more lands than the lessee would be entitled to operate.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, does not the Senator recognize, however, that a corporation can not put in the machinery and make the requisite investment in developing a property unless it has a considerable tract? Sometimes it is necessary to go a thousand feet down into the earth to get coal, and unless there is a sufficient acreage to insure that the coal deposits will last a reasonable length of time there will be no development at all. I am not wedded to any particular acreage. The number of acres proposed to be granted in this bill is, I think, about 1,500 or 1,600 acres. If that is sufficient, all right; but there might be conditions arise where the limit might appropriately be larger.

The suggestion I made as to 5,000 acres was to the effect that no corporation in any event should ever own, either by themselves or by their directors or by their stockholders, any land in excess of that amount. I should like to see it limited to less than that.

Mr. GRONNA. May I ask the Senator from Colorado a question?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes, sir.

Mr. GRONNA. What harm can there be in permitting the Government of the United States to lease fifteen or sixteen hundred acres of land to this corporation? That is not saying, Mr. President, that the land will be forever owned by the Government of the United States.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The very leasing itself implies that it is held in perpetual ownership. You are the owner; you do not propose to give up the land; you propose to lease it; and the leases are not going to be for one year or two years, but for longer intervals of time, or else you will never have any development of your coal lands. Is it possible that you expect that the Government will part with the land next year or in the next 20 years? Whenever you enter upon a leasing system it means that the Government undertakes a policy of forever holding these mines; and that is contrary to the very fundamental principles of our Government, and contrary to the usage of the Government in relation to the lands of all the States ranging from the Atlantic to the Rocky Mountain region.

Mr. GRONNA. Well, Mr. President, it implies that so long as this coal can be mined profitably, so long will those companies continue to lease it and to work it; and when the coal is exhausted the land is still public land and may be acquired by individuals in some other way.

I am not surprised that the bills which I have had pending in Congress for the last eight years, committing us to the leasing system, have been defeated, or that the committee to which they have been referred has not seen fit to report them. When I was a Member of the other House for six years I had a bill pending before that body committing us to a leasing system of the coal lands of the United States, but I never could get that bill reported out from the committee.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Was not that merely because the majority of the committee felt that it would be an unwise policy to do so?

Mr. GRONNA. I do not know, Mr. President. I had indulged the hope that after a change of administration, when the party which had condemned the party then in power for permitting individuals to acquire land under the coal-land laws, came into power they would not reverse themselves and commit themselves to a policy to sell the lands, and not to lease them.

Mr. President, I do not care to defer this matter any longer. I have said all that I care to say at this time.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, it is quite evident now that a vote can not be had this evening upon this joint resolution. I asked that the other bill, the unfinished business, might be temporarily laid aside in the hope that we could arrive at a vote in a very short period. I now ask the Senate to resume the discussion of the unfinished business; and I will ask the Senator in charge of the joint resolution if he will not lay it aside?

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I feel under unbounded obligations to the Senator from North Dakota for having consented that the joint resolution might be brought up. I really feel that I am trespassing on his generosity; but it occurs to me that we might consider the resolution an hour longer. I can hardly conceive that the debate will last an hour longer.

Mr. McCUMBER. Probably there will be a roll call, as I know there are Senators who will ask for a yea-and-nay vote. That might possibly, at some future time, before the hour is up, develop the want of a quorum; and then we would adjourn finally without a decision in the matter.

Mr. MYERS. I do not feel in a position to strain my imposition upon the generosity of the Senator from North Dakota. I will say, however, before that is done, that there were several Senators who went to committee rooms some time ago, and especially requested me to let them know before anything was done. As I say, I feel under the most unbounded gratitude and obligation to the Senator from North Dakota; yet there are two contending forces to-day in this body, and I am being rather ground up between the two. I am friendly to both, and unfriendly to neither, and do not want to take advantage of either. Some of these Senators have stepped to committee rooms, and they exacted from me a promise that I should let them know before anything was done. Personally I am not opposed to the Senator's suggestion.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will say to the Senator that it is not my intention or expectation to have any vote or to have anything done upon my bill; only to present a few more remarks on it, and undoubtedly we will then have an executive session. I simply want it to keep its place, nothing else.

Mr. MYERS. I understand that some of the Senators who are interested, and who have been in their committee rooms, have been sent for. As soon as they arrive, I shall make no objection to anything that is done. I feel that I have been treated very handsomely in allowing the joint resolution to be debated as long as it has been debated to-day, and I feel under great obligations and very grateful.

I see the Senators who asked to be sent for have arrived now, and I have nothing more to say.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, do I understand, then, that the present matter is laid aside?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HUGHES in the chair). No request——

Mr. REED. I can not hear what is going on.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No request for unanimous consent has been made, and no motion to lay the matter aside has been made.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not understand that it is necessary to have unanimous consent. I understand that the Senator in charge of a bill can lay it aside; or, where the Senator in charge of the unfinished business has consented that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside, that in any reasonable time he has a right to ask that it be taken up again, and as soon as the other matter is laid aside the unfinished business is automatically presented to the Senate again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will hold, and will lay the question before the Senate if there is any question about it, that the Senator from North Dakota has a right at this time to lay his bill before the Senate.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is the request I make.

Mr. REED. That your bill be laid before the Senate?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes. I will say to the Senator from Missouri that the bill was temporarily laid aside by me to accommodate the Senator from Montana, who wished to finish the joint resolution that he had been discussing.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. KERN. I was about to move an executive session.

Mr. McCUMBER. I first want the bill laid before the Senate and to introduce and have printed a table pertaining to it. Then I will yield to the Senator for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senate bill No. 120 is now before the Senate.

Mr. McCUMBER obtained the floor.

After the transaction of certain routine morning business, which appears under its appropriate heading:

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. REED. I understand that bills can not be introduced when a Senator has the floor in this way.

Mr. McCUMBER. I understand that it can not be done except by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that that is the rule.

Mr. REED. They declined to allow me to introduce a bill in that way by unanimous consent a day or two ago, the Chair himself invoking the rule, as is required.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The rule, as the Chair understands, is that a Senator can not be interrupted. The Senator from North Dakota had not started to make any remarks upon the bill.

Mr. REED. No, Mr. President; the rule is that a bill can not be introduced while a Senator holds the floor, and it is the duty of the Chair so to rule without any point of order being made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will be glad to have its recollection refreshed if the Chair is wrong about it. The Chair understands that the object of the rule is to prevent a Senator from being interrupted while making a speech. The Senator from North Dakota had not yet started to debate the bill.

INSPECTION AND GRADING OF GRAIN.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I understand that there is no matter now before the Senate except Senate bill 120. On page 243 of the hearings on Federal grain inspection in 1908 there is a table that was obtained from the Secretary of Agriculture giving an estimate of the cost of maintaining, under this bill, Federal inspection of grain, including the number of cities where the inspection probably would be proper, and the cost at each one of these places; also showing the number of men that probably would be required. That was six years ago. I assume that it would require more at the present time. I simply introduce the table for what it is worth, and ask that it may be printed with the statement that whatever costs are provided under the provisions of this bill will be charged to the grain itself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, permission is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Mr. REED. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield for a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. REED. Do I understand that it is now claimed that the bill of the Senator from North Dakota is laid before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is before the Senate.

Mr. REED. The Senator asked permission to lay it before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair announced that Senate bill No. 120 is before the Senate.

Mr. REED. But by what authority? The bill was displaced, and it can not come back before the Senate without action by the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of the opinion that under the peculiar condition that exists here the Senator had a right to ask to have the bill laid before the Senate, and the Chair stated that it would make that ruling subject to an appeal.

Mr. REED. But the Chair certainly does not mean to assume to put the Senate in the position of being forced to appeal from the decision of the Chair. This bill can come before the Senate by a vote or by unanimous consent. As I understand, the Senator in charge of a bill has no greater rights than any other Senator. It is true we frequently accord them. The Senator in charge of a bill is only in charge of it, however, because he assumes to be in charge. There is no rule putting anybody in charge of a bill. As a matter of courtesy, the man who is most interested in a bill generally assumes the right to control it.

I insist that without action of the Senate the grain-inspection bill is not before the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think that under the practice of the Senate, and also the rules, when the Senator from North Dakota received recognition from the Chair and asked that Senate bill 120 be laid before the Senate, the Senator from Missouri, if he had had any objection, should have raised the objection at that time, before the Chair announced that the bill was before the Senate.

Mr. REED. There was no opportunity. The question was not put to us whether we consented or whether we dissented. The Chair simply made the statement. I am not criticizing the Chair, of course.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This is the situation: The Senate, by an overwhelming vote, this afternoon decided, by a yea-and-nay vote, to take up and consider the bill in which the Senator from North Dakota is interested. The Senator then consented that that bill should be temporarily laid aside in order that a joint resolution, the consideration of which it was then believed would take very little time, should be considered.

Mr. McCUMBER. Should be temporarily considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. At the end of the consideration of the joint resolution, or at least when a period had been reached when no one else seemed to wish to debate it or consider it further, the Senator from North Dakota suggested that he was ready to lay his bill before the Senate. No objection was made at that time; and the Chair, with no precedent to guide him, made the statement that he did.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the Chair is a little in error in regard to the facts. A motion was made to proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution of the Senator from Montana. That motion was agreed to, and that absolutely gave to the joint resolution the right of way. Until the Senate takes further action, the joint resolution of the Senator from Montana is the unfinished business. The Senator from Montana, by graciously yielding, can not change the parliamentary situation at all. The joint resolution of the Senator from Montana is now before the Senate; and he can not lay it aside on his own motion, and then the Senator from North Dakota put in his bill upon his own motion. The Senate has some rights in the matter. The right of the Senate is, when the joint resolution of the Senator from Montana is laid before the Senate, that it shall stay before the Senate until the Senate, either by unanimous consent or by vote, lays it aside. The unanimous consent has not been asked, and the vote has not been had.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, will the Chair hear me for a moment upon the point of order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair is not in any hurry; he probably has about as much time as any other Member of this body, and he is willing to stay here and listen; but he does not know that there is anything before the Senate. If it is possible, the Chair will entertain a motion to appeal from the ruling the Chair has made, and will not feel at all offended if it is reversed.

Mr. REED. There was nothing before the Chair to rule upon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Except the request of the Senator from North Dakota to lay his bill before the Senate.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Is it not true that the joint resolution of the Senator from Montana is still before the Senate? He never has asked the Senate to lay it aside temporarily.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator did not make any motion with reference to it. The Chair called the attention of the Senate to the fact that the Senator from Montana had neither asked unanimous consent, nor had he made a motion, with reference to laying aside his joint resolution. Then the Senator from North Dakota asked that his bill be laid before the Senate. There was no objection, and no motion made. The Chair then stated, in the absence of parliamentary precedents to guide the Chair, that it would declare the bill to be laid before the Senate, and that there was an opportunity for any Senator to appeal from the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, then it must be true that both bills are before the Senate.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I wish I might have an opportunity to make a little statement on the parliamentary situation. I am sure every Senator will bear me out in my statement as to the custom and the construction of the rule.

Senate bill 120 was not laid aside as the unfinished business. It was temporarily laid aside, for a temporary discussion of the joint resolution. I asked unanimous consent, not that it be laid aside but that it be laid aside only temporarily while the joint resolution was under discussion. At a proper time, when it became evident that there could be no vote upon the joint resolution to-day, I asked the Senators if they would suspend, and they suspended their discussion of the joint resolution. I insist that under the rules that of itself automatically, under the unanimous-consent agreement that it was to be temporarily laid aside only, brings the bill before the Senate, even without a motion. In this case, however, the request was made. It was acted upon. I spoke upon it. Intervening business occurred. Certainly it is too late now, even if there was a possible question, to say that the bill is not before the Senate.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, let us see where that would lead us.

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] had his bill before the Senate as unfinished business, having the right of way. He had the right to hold it in that position as long as the Senate did not see fit to change the situation. Under those conditions the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] moved to proceed to the consideration of a joint resolution, and the Senate, by duly recorded vote, proceeded to take up the joint resolution of the Senator from Montana. Now, by a vote, the Senate has that resolution before it. Having the resolution before it by the vote of the Senate, the resolution must stay before the Senate until one of two things happens, namely, there must be unanimous consent asked and received to lay it aside, or there must be a motion made to proceed to the consideration of another measure. The Senator from Montana can not set aside the solemn vote of the Senate by consenting to have another bill come up. The Senate itself must act; otherwise, instead of the Senate controlling its own business, any two Senators who are amicably inclined can control the business of the Senate.

There was no unanimous consent asked to lay aside the joint resolution of the Senator from Montana. There was no vote taken to lay aside the joint resolution of the Senator from Montana. Until that is done the other measure can not come before the Senate. I insist that the Senate's right in this matter shall be maintained, and it is an important right.

Suppose the Senate meets here and determines that it wishes to lay aside the bill of the Senator from North Dakota. Suppose that were the order of business. Suppose, for good and sufficient reasons, the Senate solemnly declares that it is going to take up another bill. Then, can two Senators set aside that action of the Senate by agreement? Manifestly not; and yet that is exactly what is sought to be done here.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, will both of the Senators let me say just a word by way of personal explanation, without taking either from the floor? I should like to make a statement for the information of both sides, occupying, myself, a strictly neutral and impartial attitude in this contest.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] seems to be somewhat under a misapprehension as to what has transpired, and I should like to relate for his benefit, just exactly as I remember it, what has occurred up to this time.

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] was debating the joint resolution. He sat down, and immediately his colleague [Mr. McCUMBER] rose and addressed the Chair, and said, in effect, that he would like to have the joint resolution under discussion laid aside and the unfinished business resumed, and in a way he addressed his remarks to me and asked if I were not willing. I rose and expressed my great obligation to the Senator for having let the debate proceed so far and asked if he would not be willing to let it proceed for another hour. He said, no; he thought not; and I expressed my gratitude for its having been allowed to go as far as it had, and said: "However, before anything is done, I am under a promise to send for certain Senators who are in the committee rooms here, and whom I have promised to notify before anything is done or any change is made."

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. MYERS. I was thereupon notified by one of the employees that the Senators had been sent for. I continued to talk a little while, in a general way, stating that, personally, I had no objection, but that I felt under obligation to have these other Senators here before anything was done. While I was talking in that strain the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] and the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] walked into the Chamber here right in front of me, and I said: "There are the Senators now who have been sent for, and I have nothing more to say." Thereupon I sat down, leaving the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] in possession of the floor.

That is exactly the situation. I wish all to understand it, in order that whatever is done may be done fairly and impartially and correctly.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the statement of the Senator does him honor; but there is just one error in it, and that is that he did not get the right to bring up his joint resolution through the courtesy or kindness of the Senator from North Dakota. He got it by virtue of a vote of the Senate. The vote of the Senate having been taken——

Mr. McCUMBER. It was not that way; it was by unanimous consent.

Mr. REED. Very well; that is still stronger; but it was a vote, as I understand.

Mr. SMOOT. To make it absolutely correct, I should like to say to the Senator that Senate bill 120, the grain-inspection bill, was temporarily laid aside. It was not displaced by any vote of the Senate directly, but it was displaced as unfinished business by Senate joint resolution 41, in charge of the Senator from Montana. If that resolution was not voted upon during the day——

Mr. BRYAN. That comes about, if the Senator will permit me, by reason of the fact that the Senator from Montana made a motion.

Mr. SMOOT. Absolutely.

Mr. BRYAN. The Chair put the motion. Afterwards a question arose as to whether that would make his measure the unfinished business, and quite a colloquy took place, and the Vice President said it would.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no doubt about it; and I want to say that then the Senator from North Dakota did ask that it be temporarily laid aside. If he had not asked that, of course, the Senate would have been discussing his bill all the afternoon. That, I suppose, is the reason why the Senator from Montana says his joint resolution was taken up by the courtesy of the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. REED. I understand the phraseology of the Senator from Montana——

Mr. MYERS. Just one word further, please. I will say that I have neither consented nor refused to consent to anything since this matter came up.

Mr. REED. I understand that.

Mr. MYERS. I have neither yielded nor refused to yield on anything.

Mr. REED. But the Senate, by vote, has taken up the joint resolution of the Senator from Montana, and that is before the Senate and will remain before the Senate until the Senate itself sets aside its action.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I dislike exceedingly to engage in this controversy, because I think I must have forgotten a good many of the rules of the Senate in view of some things that have occurred here recently.

The fact is that when a bill is laid aside temporarily it is usually for the purpose of giving some Senator, by unanimous consent, the privilege of concluding a speech or of bringing some matter before the Senate, in which case, when the speech is terminated or the business transacted the unfinished business comes before the Senate, either automatically or upon request of the Senator having it in charge.

In this case the Senator from Montana made a motion. Had he asked unanimous consent and brought up his joint resolution in that way, beyond question the Senator from North Dakota could now ask that his bill should be laid before the Senate, and its consideration would be continued. Inasmuch as a motion was made, however, and the Senate, by vote, brought up another measure, of course it is patent that the Senator from Montana and the Senator from North Dakota can not play battledore and shuttlecock with two measures here—keep one measure before the Senate part of the time and have another measure before the Senate part of the time, and in that way take charge of the business of the Senate.

Mr. MYERS. Just a word, Mr. President. I have not tried to do anything of that kind. I have simply been a passive recipient of whatever came my way. [Laughter.]

Mr. GALLINGER. I have no doubt, in view of the vote taken to-day, that the Senator from North Dakota can get his bill before the Senate at any time when he has the parliamentary right to make a motion; but I must agree with the Senator from Missouri that under the rules of the Senate, unless unanimous consent is given to lay aside the joint resolution the Senator from Montana has in charge, nothing else is before the Senate.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I think the Senator certainly has forgotten some of the rules of the Senate——

Mr. GALLINGER. I have.

Mr. McCUMBER (continuing). If he feels that there is any difference between a bill getting before the Senate by unanimous consent and getting before it by motion. Whether the bill comes before the Senate by unanimous consent or whether it comes before it by motion, nevertheless, when it gets before the Senate it is exactly in the same position in either case.

Mr. President, there must have been a basis under which the joint resolution, either by motion or by unanimous consent, could get before the Senate. What was that basis? The unfinished business was the grain-inspection bill. I had a right to ask that it be temporarily laid aside. It has been the custom, and a custom that has been observed with the utmost good faith by every Senator ever since I have been here, that laying a matter temporarily aside for some other business does not take it out of its place nor put it in a position where its consideration can not be resumed. Why, Senators may ask to introduce bills. That is new business, but it does not displace the unfinished business, because the Senator having the floor yields and allows them to do that and for that particular purpose the measure is temporarily laid aside.

Now, the Senator from Missouri in his argument yesterday stated that he wanted to get this matter before the Senate in what he regarded as the regular way, and then he would be satisfied to take it up. I ask Senators to exercise that good faith toward this bill that we give to every Senator, that when a Senator yields as an accommodation they do not attempt to take advantage of that to get his bill in a different position. Otherwise there would be no such thing as courtesy extended between Senators. I yielded, and I yielded temporarily for that particular purpose, not that it would be finished, because I said at the time that I would yield only for the purpose of discussing it, and if we could get to a vote in a reasonable time we would then vote upon it. With that understanding and with unanimous consent that the bill be laid aside for that purpose, I say under that unanimous-consent agreement I have a right to take it up again.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have only one word more to say. The Senator from North Dakota is not correct in his contention, for this reason. The joint resolution of the Senator from Montana being now before the Senate on motion, it can not be displaced except by a motion which will give precedence to another bill or else by unanimous consent. Had the Senator from Montana asked unanimous consent to lay the bill aside, we all know that a single objection would have prevented that, and we would have had to go along with the consideration of the bill. I think the Senator from North Dakota did lay his bill aside temporarily out of courtesy, and I regret the parliamentary situation has got into the shape it has. But what I am contending for is simply a fair and reasonable construction of the rules of this body. Evidently we can not have two bills before the Senate at the same time, and that will be the situation we will be in if we allow the contention of the Senator from North Dakota to prevail.

The Senator meant, of course, to do what he did out of courtesy, and we all respect that. I am in sympathy with the Senator's bill as I understand it now. I do not exactly know for certain how I shall vote, but I think he is making a good case.

I submit to the Senator that it would be better if he should let this matter rest as it is. The Vice President ruled on the question this afternoon. The question was propounded to the Chair as to whether or not the joint resolution would remain the unfinished business if it remained before the Senate until the hour of adjournment, and he said it would become the unfinished business. It can only get out of the way either by a vote or by unanimous consent. There is no other way.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the Chair did rule that if there was an adjournment without the matter being disposed of——

Mr. GALLINGER. That is what I said.

Mr. McCUMBER. Then the bill would cease to be the unfinished business. I am not going to challenge that now, because the occasion has not come up for it, but the Chair has ruled. I asked that the bill be laid before the Senate. Under the circumstances the Senators could not object to it, and they did not object to it. The Chair laid the bill before the Senate, and after it was laid before the Senate I proceeded, and I have nearly concluded my remarks.

I insist we can not now go back to this intervening business after a matter has been discussed. I can very shortly turn to the rules, and, I think, to precedents, upon that point, and ask for a reruling upon the rule of the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, while I am in sympathy with the Senator from North Dakota in this matter, I want to dissent from the position he has taken that the bill would be in exactly the same position with a vote as it would be by unanimous consent.

Mr. GALLINGER. Of course, it would not.

Mr. SMOOT. The practice of the Senate has always been against that contention. If the Senator from Montana had asked unanimous consent, as was stated by the Senator from New Hampshire, to take up his joint resolution and unanimous consent had been granted, there is not any question but that the grain bill would have been the unfinished business Monday morning. But he did not do that. He moved to take it up, and if the joint resolution is not disposed of before adjournment to-day it will be the unfinished business on Monday.

The Senator said it was the same as if he yielded to a Senator to introduce a bill, and that that was a temporary laying of the bill aside. That is not the case, Mr. President. The bill is only introduced. The Senate is not asked to pass upon it or discuss it at all. It immediately goes to a committee.

What my remarks were based upon before was what I understood and heard when I came into the Senate door. The Senator from North Dakota asked that Senate bill 120 be laid before the Senate. Of course, I understood that that had been done. I understood the Chair to say that the bill was before the Senate. I did not know what had happened before; but I say under the rules the only way to take up the bill would be to have some disposition made of the joint resolution which was brought before the Senate by the motion of the Senator from Montana.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah is splitting hairs upon that proposition; nor can he cite the Chair or anyone else to a rule which shows that there is any difference, so far as the right in a bill is concerned, whether it gets before the Senate by unanimous consent or otherwise. In this instance, however, the vote was unanimous. There was not a single vote against the motion of the Senator from Montana to take up his joint resolution, and that made it a unanimous vote. Whether it is by unanimous consent or whether it is by a vote——

Mr. SMOOT. I think the RECORD will show that there were quite a number of votes against it.

Mr. McCUMBER. The RECORD will show that when the Senator from Montana asked unanimous consent there was objection, but afterwards, when it was put to a vote, there was not a single vote against it.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. I inquire, What is before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is unable to give any information on the parliamentary status. As the Chair recollects it, this afternoon a record vote was taken on the question of taking up and considering Senate bill 120. It had been stated on the floor that some advantage had been taken of certain Senators because the original motion had been made in executive session. The Senator from North Dakota, as the Chair understood him, resubmitted that question to the Senate. My understanding at that time was that the Senate was then to decide whether it would stand by the action it had previously taken. A vote was had, and the Senate, by a large majority, decided to affirm what had previously happened, and Senate bill No 120 was taken up for consideration and became the unfinished business.

Afterwards the Senator from North Dakota agreed to temporarily lay that business aside at the request of another Senator having another measure to consider. A question arose as to whether the Senator from North Dakota desired to resume the consideration of his bill. He made a statement to that effect. No objection was made by anyone. The statement was made by the Senator from North Dakota that certain Senators were not here who wanted to be here when the matter was disposed of, and he continued his statement until he announced finally that the Senators were in the Chamber. Still, nothing was done. The Chair stated that no motion had been made and no unanimous consent had been asked. Finally the Senator from North Dakota asked that he be permitted to lay his bill before the Senate. The Chair, in the absence of any parliamentary precedent to guide him, stated that he would lay the bill before the Senate subject to an appeal to the Senate, thus in effect that that would be granted as the express will of the Senate as recorded in the yea-and-nay vote taken earlier in the day. A simple way to remedy all that would be to appeal from the decision of the Chair, if the Senate does not agree wtih the ruling he has made.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, is not this true? When the Senator from North Dakota temporarily laid aside his bill by unanimous consent, and that was the only way he could do it, the Senator from Montana on motion took up his joint resolution. The Senator from North Dakota stated that he would lay his bill aside for the Senator from Montana, but that he could not do so, as there was objection, and it required a motion. The Senate then formally by a motion took up the joint resolution of the Senator from Montana, and the action of the Senate placed the joint resolution which the Senator from Montana has in charge before the Senate. That joint resolution is before the Senate by the action of the Senate after a unanimous consent, laying aside, at the request of the Senator from North Dakota, the bill of which he has charge.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I do not care about arguing the question any further. The Chair has ruled on the matter. I can find the rule, I think, if the Chair has any doubt about it, to the effect that after we begin the discussion upon a bill that had been laid before the Senate we can not go back again and raise an objection to its consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair, of course, has ruled, but the Chair has not the slightest objection to being overruled on the subject. The Chair is not relying upon parliamentary precedent. He stated deliberately what he proposed to do, and invited an appeal. The Chair was simply attempting to give effect to what he believed was the general understanding.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I was seeking to direct the attention of the Chair to a part of the history of the matter which the Chair had not mentioned, which I think would change the view of the Chair. I would be glad to ask for a reference to the notes of the Reporter, to see if it is not true that after the Senator from North Dakota requested to temporarily lay aside his bill, which was done by unanimous consent, the Senate formally by a vote took up the joint resolution of the Senator from Montana and put it before the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is conceded.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If that is true, is it not still here?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will say that he was not informed of that particular piece of parliamentary history of the transaction.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is the important feature, it seems to me, Mr. President, that controls the matter, if it is true, and I should like information upon it. It is my recollection that there was a formal vote taken by the Senate upon proceeding to consider the joint resolution of the Senator from Montana. I would regret to see any precedent made, if that is true, that this formal action of the Senate could be displaced simply by the request of one Senator without the consent of all Senators.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I desire to say that after that motion was made I asked the Chair if the joint resolution, having been taken up by motion, would not displace the unfinished business if continued to the end of the day.

Mr. REED. I think the Chair is perfectly willing to change the ruling without putting it to an appeal on a question where he ruled without having considered an important and controlling fact, namely, that the Senate by a vote had determined to take up a certain measure, and that it can not be laid aside unless the Senate shall again vote to lay it aside.

Mr. McCUMBER. This is a point of order upon that suggestion. The Chair laid Senate bill 120 before the Senate, and I have been discussing that bill—Senate 120. After it was laid before the Senate, and after any address has been made upon it, we can not then raise the question as to how it was laid before the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I was seeking to bring these facts to the attention of the Chair, because it seemed to me the Chair would modify the ruling with a full knowledge of the facts, hoping that that course would be taken rather than to take an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. REED. So far as the point made by the Senator from North Dakota, that business was transacted, is concerned, this is just what occurred: There was some confusion in the Chamber. The Senator made a request which I did not fully understand, and the Chair said that the bill would be laid before the Senate. As soon as I grasped what was being done, I took the floor. The Senator from North Dakota held it for some time. As soon as I could get the ear of the Chair I raised a parliamentary inquiry, and that has developed these facts.

Now, Mr. President, this is not a new matter. The situation often arises that a bill stands as the unfinished business, and it is temporarily laid aside and another bill is by a vote taken up. It is the universal rule that that other bill taken up on motion remains the unfinished business unless the bill that was temporarily laid aside is taken up each day and the second bill laid aside so that it may be taken up, or unless there is a vote of the Senate. That happens right along, and that is the situation right now. I think the President of the Senate ought simply to rule, as he is now advised of the facts, that the joint resolution of the Senator from Montana is before this body. It can not be taken away except by a vote of the Senate, and then when that is done the Senate can proceed to do as it sees best.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I insist that the complete understanding of the unanimous consent which I asked that this bill may be temporarily laid aside for the discussion of the joint resolution and the statement that I should call it up again if we did not get a vote upon the other measure in a reasonable time, taken together, indicates that the purpose was that the joint resolution might be only temporarily discussed, and that we should resume this bill if we could not get to a vote upon that measure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What does the Senator say to the statement made by the Senator from Georgia that there was objection to granting unanimous consent, and that then a motion was made to take up the joint resolution?

Mr. McCUMBER. No; there was no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair was not in the chair at that time.

Mr. McCUMBER. There was no objection at all made to my request for unanimous consent.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There was no objection to the Senator laying the bill aside, but there was objection to his laying it aside and letting the Senator from Montana temporarily take up his joint resolution; and after the bill of the Senator from North Dakota was temporarily laid aside it required the affirmative action of the Senate on a motion before the Senator from Montana was allowed to proceed. No arrangement was recognized between the Senators by the Senate, but after the bill of the Senator from North Dakota had been temporarily laid aside the Senate itself, by a majority vote and not by unanimous consent, overruling the minority, took up the joint resolution of the Senator from Montana.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I want to correct the Senator. He evidently could not have been in the Senate Chamber.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will understand that the Chair has no knowledge of that particular question of fact.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will state, Mr. President, the fact, because I have knowledge of it. I was here when the requests were made. As I stated before, the Senator from Montana was desirous of securing a vote upon his joint resolution to-day, and I was disposed to allow Senate bill 120 to be temporarily laid aside if he could in a reasonable time secure a vote upon that measure. I then afterwards asked unanimous consent that my bill might be temporarily laid aside. There was no objection to that unanimous consent, and it was temporarily laid aside. Then the Senator from Montana asked unanimous consent that his joint resolution might be taken up. There was objection to that unanimous consent. The Senator from Montana then moved that his resolution be taken up, and there were no votes in the negative; it was a unanimous vote in favor of taking it up, which put it exactly in the same position as it would have been if he had obtained unanimous consent.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the difference between the Senator from North Dakota and myself applies to the very first of his remarks, and I am sure the reporter's notes will sustain my recollection of it. I was here at the time the Senator from North Dakota stated that he desired to temporarily lay aside his bill for the purpose of giving the Senator from Montana an opportunity to bring up his joint resolution. There was some objection to any such arrangement; there was objection voiced on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. McCUMBER rose.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. One moment. Then the Senator from North Dakota said that he could not control the action of the Senate as to what measure it would take up, but that he would ask unanimous consent to temporarily lay aside his bill. To that suggestion of his there was no objection; and the unanimous consent was given; but when the proposition to temporarily lay aside was coupled with the designation of the measure which was to be taken up, there was objection. When the designation of the measure to be taken up was omitted from the request, there was no objection. Then the action of the Senate itself placed the resolution of the Senator from Montana before the Senate.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Georgia will have to modify his statement a little bit. He is coming closer to the proposition.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is what I have said all the time. I am no closer to it than I was at first. That was my position from the first.

Mr. McCUMBER. I stated at the time that I made my request for the accommodation of the Senator from Montana. I stated, in connection with that, that, of course, I could not control the matter as to whether the Senate would consent to his taking up his measure, and could not necessarily couple it in my request for unanimous consent that my bill be temporarily laid aside and that his resolution be taken up; but my request for unanimous consent was granted for the sole and only purpose that he might attempt in any proper way to get his joint resolution before the Senate temporarily.

I want to say to the Senator that there was unanimous consent to lay my bill temporarily aside. If I ask to lay my bill aside temporarily, that does not mean to lay it permanently aside for anything. There is a meaning which has always been accorded to the words "temporarily laid aside," namely, that the measure will not be permanently displaced by the one for which it is laid aside. The Senate understood, I understood, everyone understood that it was laid aside for this particular purpose and for discussion for a reasonable length of time on the other measure. So I submit to the Senate that good faith on the part of the Senate should guide the body in seeing that my unfinished business be not displaced. The Senators from Montana do not desire to displace it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I really am not desiring to displace the unfinished business or the position of the bill of the Senator from North Dakota. I am merely insisting that Senators can not make an arrangement of that kind. We objected to their making the arrangement, and the Senate itself took charge of it. The private desires of Senators can not control in such matters. The Senate can now displace the resolution of the Senator from Montana and return to the unfinished business of the Senator from North Dakota if it so desires, and I do not object to it doing so. I merely object to what I think is not a correct construction of the rule, namely, that Senators can between themselves control the matter.

Mr. McCUMBER. No, Mr. President.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And if we finish the joint resolution of the Senator from Montana, I do not know, after it was temporarily laid aside, whether automatically the bill of the Senator from North Dakota would come up again; I do not think it would.

Mr. McCUMBER. It might not after an adjournment, although that would be another question.

Mr. REED. Manifestly.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senate, Mr. President, can not eliminate the fact that in this case, for the accommodation of the Senators who were interested, I asked unanimous consent to lay my bill, the unfinished business, temporarily aside—not permanently—with the understanding that it should come up next. The Senator knew, I knew, and there is not a single Senator here who did not know that I was giving that accommodation with the understanding that it would not in any way displace the bill as unfinished business. That being the case, I insist that I have the right to have the Senate confirm that understanding.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, is it not possible to have the reporter's notes read, so that the Senate may know just exactly what did happen?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. They can be read.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think they have been stated satisfactorily.

Mr. WALSH. I understand the notes have already been read, and we have consumed a whole hour now in this idle discussion of these matters. Can we not really make some progress? I trust sincerely that my colleague will not be put in the attitude of making a request of the Senator from North Dakota to give place to him that his joint resolution might be considered by the Senate, the Senator from North Dakota kindly yielding for that purpose, and then have the Senator from North Dakota placed in the attitude where he will lose whatever right he has to the floor of the Senate for the consideration of his bill. However it was done, can we not agree in some way or other that the action of the Chair shall be reversed and that there then shall be unanimous consent to take up the bill of the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It does not require unanimous consent.

Mr. WALSH. It is not fair to put it in the shape of a motion, because the motion may be defeated at this time, and thus the Senator from North Dakota will not reach the end he desires.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If we can get anything like a unanimous-consent agreement, we can certainly adopt a motion.

Mr. SMOOT. It would require a call of the roll.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; we can have a viva voce vote. I am perfectly willing to have that done.

Mr. WALSH. I hope we shall have a determination of the question.

Mr. McCUMBER. I want to say, in answer to the Senator from Montana, that after the labor I have had, having yielded to Senators when they thought I had taken an advantage of them in the method by which my bill was made the unfinished business, having consented that it might go back to its former position and be voted upon, I am willing to agree to anything that Senators may think fair and proper, so that the bill may remain the unfinished business.

Mr. WALSH. It occurred to me that we might be consuming the time of the Senate in more profitable discussion than in the discussion of parliamentary practice.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, this whole difficulty, or a large part of it at least, grew out of a misunderstanding in regard to the action of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] when he first secured the status of unfinished business for his bill. It was urged, and urged with a good deal of heat—with more heat than I like to see exhibited in this Chamber—that the Senator from North Dakota had not used that due courtesy which ought to have accompanied his action. Thereupon the Senator from North Dakota brought the matter before the full Senate this morning, and the Senate voted to make his bill the unfinished business.

We all know what the purpose of the Senator from North Dakota was in asking that his bill be laid aside to-day. It was not that it might be displaced by the action of the Senate, but that it might afford accommodation to the Senator from Montana to bring forth his joint resolution. It seems to me that if unanimous consent is now asked to lay aside the measure of the Senator from Montana, it ought not to be taken advantage of adversely by those who are urging so strenuously against the "snap judgment" which they said the Senator from North Dakota had taken in executive session.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am perfectly willing to join in such a unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I hope the Senator from Montana will ask unanimous consent that his joint resolution may be laid aside.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I would be glad to see the matter take that direction.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I greatly deplore being put in the attitude of being the beneficiary of the kindness of the Senator from North Dakota and then seeing his kindness result in his own undoing. I regret it greatly; and yet I do not see how I could have done differently from what I have done. Before this discussion began three Senators had told me they were going to their committee rooms, and asked me to notify them if anything was done or if any change was made. I promised them I would do so. When the Senator from North Dakota made his request, I said that I had no objection. I had promised to send for those Senators, and they were sent for. I have simply tried to lay an entire and correct statement of the facts before the Senate.

Personally I greatly deplore that the Senator from North Dakota has been placed at a disadvantage because of his courtesy to me, for, whether it was done through his grace or the act of the Senate, he intended to give me the benefit of several hours' debate on my joint resolution, which I have received; and now, as I have said, I greatly deplore seeing him put at a disadvantage. However, while I am on the floor, if it can be done at this juncture of the parliamentary tangle, I ask unanimous consent that Senate joint resolution 41 be laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana asks unanimous consent that Senate joint resolution 41 be laid aside. Is there objection?

Mr. REED. Is that joint resolution before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is prepared to rule on that question, if the Senator desires it ruled upon.

Mr. REED. Yes; I desire it ruled upon as a parliamentary inquiry before the request for unanimous consent is put. Is the joint resolution of the Senator from Montana now before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In view of the information which has come to the Chair that this joint resolution came up on motion—and the Chair has examined the transcript for the RECORD from which it appears that joint resolution No. 41 did come before the Senate on motion—while the Chair feels that the Senate this afternoon practically assured the Senator from North Dakota that his bill would retain the status that it had theretofore, and while the Chair feels that the Senate practically, by unanimous consent, this afternoon agreed that it would still have that status as soon as the Senate finished the consideration of joint resolution 41, yet, as a former occupant of the chair said, the Chair does not feel that he is the guardian of the honor of the Senate, and he holds that the business now before the Senate is the consideration of joint resolution No. 41 by reason of the fact that it was regularly taken up on motion.

Mr. REED. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unanimous-consent request has not been disposed of.

Mr. REED. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will say that the request of the Senator from Montana for unanimous consent——

Mr. REED. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri objects.

Mr. REED. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was rejected.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Jersey.

The motion was rejected.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 120 so that it may become the unfinished business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from North Dakota that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 120 so that it may become the unfinished business.

Mr. REED. If the Senator desires to discuss the motion, I do not desire to take the floor.

Mr. McCUMBER. The motion is not debatable, as I understand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. REED. I think it is debatable after 2 o'clock.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Chair ruled this afternoon that it was not debatable.

Mr. REED. I think it is debatable after 2 o'clock. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bradley	James	Newlands	Smith, Md.
Brandegee	Johnson	Norris	Smoot
Bristow	Jones	Overman	Sterling
Bryan	Kenyon	Owen	Thomas
Catron	Kern	Perkins	Thompson

Mr. KERN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. SHIVELY].

Mr. OVERMAN. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. SIMMONS] is absent on account of sickness.

Mr. POMERENE. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator can not make that motion until the result of the roll call is announced. Thirty-nine Senators have answered to the roll call—less than a quorum.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move that the names of the absentees be called.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the names of the absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absentees; and Mr. CHILTON, Mr. DILLINGHAM, Mr. GALLINGER, Mr. LEA of Tennessee, Mr. O'GORMAN, and Mr. SHERMAN answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-five Senators have answered to their names—not a quorum.

Mr. POMERENE. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio moves that the Senate adjourn. [Putting the question.] By the sound the noes appear to have it.

Mr. REED and Mr. GORE. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Chair if the Chair is satisfied that there were a sufficient number of Senators seconding the motion for a yea-and-nay vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Whatever doubts the Chair had, it resolved in favor of the roll call.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am willing to accept the decision of the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLAPP (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], who is absent on account of sickness. Not knowing how he would vote if present, I withhold my vote.

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). Transferring my pair with the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] so that he may stand paired with the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON], I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. JAMES. I transfer the pair I have with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] to the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. CHILTON (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], and will allow my vote to stand.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, March 21, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We lift up our hearts in gratitude and praise to Thee, O God our Father, for Thy goodness and for Thy wonderful works to the children of men; for the intellectual, moral, and spiritual gifts with which Thou hast so richly endowed us; the sweet and tender affections which find their highest expression in the home; the great and growing Republic with its sacred institutions of which we are a part; the religion which makes for righteousness in the soul. May we use these inestimable blessings to the honor and glory of Thy holy name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

TAXATION IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to file minority views on the so-called George bill to this House.

The SPEAKER. In how long a time?

Mr. GEORGE. Within an hour.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to file minority views on the so-called George bill and have them printed. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PARCEL POST.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting an article on parcel post printed in the Dry Goods Economist of February 28.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing an article on the parcel post.

Mr. BARTLETT. Reserving the right to object, who is the article by?

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. It is an article printed in the Dry Goods Economist of February 28. There is no author's name given, but it is a very interesting article, and it is very short.

Mr. BARTLETT. I have no objection; I only wished to know by whom the article is written.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

DANIEL THEW WRIGHT.

Mr. PARK. Mr. Speaker, at the adjournment hour on yesterday I brought to the attention of the House certain charges which I was about to deliver to the House.

Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of the highest privilege and of the greatest importance. By virtue of my office as a Member of the House of Representatives I impeach Daniel Thew Wright, an associate justice of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, of high crimes and misdemeanors.

I charge him with having accepted favors from practitioners at the bar of his court and of having permitted counsel for a street railway company to indorse his notes while said counsel was retained by said street railway company in business and causes before his court.

I charge him with performing the service of a lawyer and accepting a fee during his tenure of judicial office, in violation of the statute of the United States.

I charge him with collecting and wrongfully appropriating other people's money.

I charge him with purposely changing the record to prevent reversal of causes wherein he presided.

I charge him with bearing deadly weapons in violation of law.

I charge him with judicial misconduct in the trial of a writ of habeas corpus to an extent which provoked a reviewing court of the District of Columbia to justly characterize the trial as a "travesty of justice."

I charge him with arbitrarily revoking, without legal right, the order of a judge of concurrent jurisdiction, appointing three receivers, so as to favor his friend by appointing him sole receiver.

I charge him with being guilty of various other acts of personal and judicial misconduct for which he should be impeached.

I charge him with being morally and temperamentally unfit to hold judicial office.

Mr. Speaker, in accordance with former proceedings before the House in like cases, I submit the following resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 446.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be directed to inquire and report whether the action of this House is necessary concerning the alleged official misconduct of Daniel Thew Wright; whether he has accepted favors from lawyers appearing before him; whether he has permitted counsel for a street railway company to indorse his notes while said counsel was retained in business and causes before his court; whether he has performed the services of lawyer and accepted a fee during his tenure of judicial office, in violation of the statutes of the United States; whether he has collected and wrongfully appropriated other people's money; whether he has purposely changed the record in order to prevent reversal of causes wherein he presided; whether he has borne deadly weapons in violation of law; whether he is guilty of judicial misconduct in the trial of a writ of habeas corpus to an extent which provoked a reviewing court of the District of Columbia to justly characterize the trial as a "travesty of justice"; whether he has arbitrarily revoked, without legal right, an order of a judge of concurrent jurisdiction, appointing three receivers, so as to favor his friend by appointing him sole receiver; whether he is morally and temperamentally unfit to hold judicial office; and whether he has been guilty of various other acts of personal and judicial misconduct for which he should be impeached.

That this committee is hereby authorized and empowered to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, to employ, if necessary, an additional clerk and stenographer, and to appoint and send a subcommittee whenever and wherever necessary to take testimony for the use of said subcommittee.

That the subcommittee shall have the same power in respect to obtaining testimony as is herein given to the said Committee on the Judiciary; and the Speaker shall have authority to sign and the Clerk to attest subpœnas for any witness or witnesses.

That the expenses incurred in this investigation shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve a point of order on the resolution.

Mr. PARK. Mr. Speaker, I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary without debate.

Mr. MANN. I withdraw the point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Georgia to refer this resolution and charges to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

AMBASSADOR WALTER HINES PAGE.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I move that the Committee on Rules be discharged from the further consideration of House resolution 438.

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order that the motion is not in order.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. This is a resolution, Mr. Speaker, of inquiry introduced on March 12, and no report has been made thereon.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, this resolution the gentleman says was referred to the Rules Committee. There is no motion in order to discharge the Committee on Rules.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. It was introduced more than a week ago.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has already sustained the point of order and can not do any more.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Does not the rule provide, Mr. Speaker, that when a resolution has been introduced making inquiry of a department more than a week before and no report thereon that it becomes a privileged resolution?

The SPEAKER. How did it happen to go to the Committee on Rules?

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. I do not know. I will ask that the resolution be read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to have the resolution read.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I beg the pardon of the Chair, this resolution was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. I move that the Committee on Foreign Affairs be discharged.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolution for information.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 438.

Resolved, That the Secretary of State is requested to furnish to this House immediately the following information, to wit:

First. Whether Ambassador Walter Hines Page to the Court of St. James made such statement on the night of March 11 as alleged in the Associated Press dispatches that: "The Monroe doctrine simply meant this, that the United States would prefer that no European Governments should gain more land in the New World," which is in effect a declaration that the Monroe doctrine is not an American policy but merely an American desire to be expressed to European monarchies but not to be enforced, and it would seem to portend the policy of the State Department to abandon, upon first demand, the Monroe doctrine, and to invite such European violation or demand.

Second. To inform this House further whether such statements of Ambassador Page, if made, have the sanction of the State Department.

Third. Whether it is and will be the policy of the State Department to abandon the Monroe doctrine.

Fourth. Whether the further alleged statement by Ambassador Page that: "The United States had not constructed the Panama Canal for Great Britain, but that it had added greatly to the pleasure of building that great work to know that British vessels would profit most by its use," indicating a new American policy of subjecting American weal to the selfish interests of the nations of Europe, upon their demand, in the use of America's private property, constructed and financed under her own control, and bearing the same relation in international law as the private property of this Nation among the nations of the world as does private property belonging to an individual within a nation between citizens of such nation.

And to state whether that be the fundamental reason upon which a demand to repeal the law now in force exempting American vessels conducting a coastwise trade from canal tolls and thereby the use by Americans of private property constructed and owned by the American public, in order to give to Great Britain a greater advantage.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order against the resolution on the ground that it is not privileged, because it includes nonprivileged matter, to wit, an expression of opinion on the part of the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The SPEAKER. What is the gentleman's point of order?

Mr. GARDNER. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MURRAY] in the last four or five lines on page 1 of the resolution expresses his opinion as to what Ambassador Page's words might signify.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, the rule refers to the expression of opinion on the part of the State Department, and in that event it would not be in order. This does not seek an opinion of the department. That is the rule the gentleman seeks to invoke.

Mr. GARDNER. No, Mr. Speaker; the gentleman is giving his own opinion, which is nonprivileged matter, and the incorporation of nonprivileged matter in a privileged resolution destroys the privilege of the resolution under the rules of the House.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, the rule is that where a resolution calls for the opinion of the department it is not in order, but this resolution does not call for the opinion of the department, but merely for a statement of the facts.

The SPEAKER. What is the language on which the gentleman from Massachusetts bases his point of order?

Mr. GARDNER. It is the language in which the gentleman from Oklahoma says that this expression of opinion on the part of Ambassador Page is tantamount to saying that the United States intends to abandon the Monroe doctrine, or something of that sort.

The SPEAKER. After reciting what Ambassador Page is alleged to have said, the gentleman from Oklahoma then in the resolution says:

Which is in effect a declaration that the Monroe doctrine is not an American policy but merely an American desire to be expressed to European monarchies but not to be enforced, and it would seem to portend the policy of the State Department to abandon, upon first demand, the Monroe doctrine, and to invite such European violation or demand.

That is the language to which the gentleman objects?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, in reply to that I have to say that a resolution of this character which has a preamble which requires an opinion on the part of the department would not be in order, but this is not asking an opinion of the department. I will admit that there is an expression of opinion on my part, but that does not vitiate the proposition.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, the rule is perfectly clear, and has been decided over and over again in this House, that the inclusion of nonprivileged matter in a privileged resolution destroys the privilege of the resolution. Clearly the gentleman's private opinion presents no question of privilege.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I think the third paragraph undoubtedly violates the rule. It calls on the Secretary of State to say whether it is and will be the policy of the State Department to abandon the Monroe doctrine. If that be not calling for an opinion or a conclusion, then what is?

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. That only calls for a statement of facts.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It does not call for the statement of a fact, because what will be can not be a fact.

The SPEAKER. Is that the statement of an opinion? Where is that language in the resolution?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is contained in lines 4 and 5, on page 2 of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Speaker will ask the gentleman from New York whether that calls for an opinion or a fact?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It calls for a conclusion. It can not be a fact. What the future policy will be can not be a fact. It can only be a conclusion or an opinion of some person.

The SPEAKER. Let us suppose a case. Suppose the State Department had determined it would abandon the Monroe doctrine, and then it is asked whether it has determined to do so. Would the statement of that be the statement of fact or opinion?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, the State Department can not determine what the future policy will be so as to make it an actual fact. A fact can only exist when it happens. The opinion of the Secretary of State that he will or will not abandon the Monroe doctrine does not make a fact out of it.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, not only is what the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] states clearly true, but in line 19, on page 2, this language occurs:

And to state whether that be the fundamental reason upon which a demand to repeal the law now in force exempting American vessels conducting a coastwise trade from canal tolls—

And so forth. Clearly, that is asking an opinion as to what is the reason.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. That is a request to state a fact.

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, by no stretch of the imagination can it be made to state a fact. It is the expression of a reason.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I submit that neither of the objections stated by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] is good. I call upon the Secretary of State to determine a fact in his own mind as to what he is doing and intends to do now and what is the policy, and I do not call for any conclusions or deductions, but the resolution asks him to state a fact. I will admit that I draw a conclusion of my own in the resolution, but that does not vitiate it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does not the gentleman believe that the matter included in lines 19 to 24, on page 2 of the resolution, calls for a conclusion?

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. I think not.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Asking the Secretary of State to state whether it be the fundamental reason upon which a demand to repeal the law now in force, and so forth?

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. That would be calling for a statement of whether that is his reason.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is not in order. According to the gentleman's own confession it calls for a reason or opinion.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. No; I do not admit that.

The SPEAKER. There is no need of arguing the matter further. It has been ruled time out of mind that if a resolution contains matter that is not privileged it vitiates the whole resolution, and undoubtedly this resolution does contain matter that is not privileged. The Chair does not know whether the State Department knows what its future policy is going to be, and it does not make a bit of difference whether it does or does not. If it should undertake to state what it was going to be, then it would be the expression of opinion and not the statement of a fact, and therefore obnoxious to the rule. It could state what the policy is for to-day, but what it is going to be to-morrow or the next day or the next year or 50 years from now is purely guesswork and is an opinion, and therefore the Chair holds that the resolution is not privileged.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Clark G. Russell, Sixty-first Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 13811, the river and harbor appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 13811, the river and harbor appropriation bill, with Mr. ALEXANDER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13811) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving harbor at Beverly, Mass., in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 220, Sixty-third Congress, first session, and subject to the conditions set forth in said document, as modified in the report in Rivers and Harbors Committee Document No. 8, Sixty-third Congress, second session, $61,500: Provided, That the Secretary of War may enter into a contract or contracts for such materials and work as may be necessary to complete the said project, to be paid for as appropriations may from time to time be made by law, not to exceed in the aggregate $61,500, exclusive of the amount herein appropriated.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the paragraph from line 15 to line 26, inclusive, be temporarily passed over without prejudice.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks that the paragraph from line 15 to line 26 be passed informally without prejudice. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, what is the reason and how long does the gentleman desire to have it passed over?

Mr. TREADWAY. The reason is that this is a continuing contract, half of the amount being appropriated in this bill and half a continuing contract for the next year. Owing to local conditions it would be much more satisfactory if the whole amount could be appropriated at the present time so that rather than offer an amendment making that appropriation I ask unanimous consent that the item be continued for the time being or until later during the reading of the bill.

Mr. MADDEN. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. TREADWAY. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. What is the difference whether part is let by contract and the other part for cash provided for it?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. MADDEN. I am asking the gentleman a question.

Mr. TREADWAY. I did not hear the gentleman's question.

Mr. MADDEN. I asked whether the fact that part of this was an appropriation paid in cash and the other part shall be let by contract and be appropriated for later would make any difference in the execution of the work?

Mr. TREADWAY. It would make a difference, Mr. Chairman, in this respect: Money is to be provided by the State and by the local authorities in connection with this appropriation, and it would become available sooner if this were all made in one item of appropriation now rather than a continuing contract. It is in order to straighten that matter out that I would like to have the paragraph passed over temporarily.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I would have no objection to the change myself, and I think it had better go over until the amendment can be prepared. It adds nothing whatever to the amount of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Improving harbor at Boston, Mass.: For maintenance, $200,000.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I tried to indicate to the committee yesterday in the course of my remarks something of the history connected with the development of the port of Boston. I want to say we have had generous appropriations by the Federal Government, and also that the State authorities and the municipal authorities of Boston have been very liberal in their expenditures for the development of that port. May I briefly call the attention of the committee to some of the results that have flowed from those expenditures in the development of this port?

During the year 1913, 14 steamship companies either began or announced the establishment during the year 1914 of new services at Boston or materially improved existing services.

There are now 33 large passenger-carrying steamships over 500 feet long in regular service at the port or under contract to enter service at the port in the near future, including such boats as Kaiserine Auguste Victoria, 25,000 tons, draft 34 feet; Amerika, 23,000 tons, draft 33 feet 6 inches; Carmania, 20,000 tons, draft 33 feet 3 inches; Caronia, 20,000 tons, draft 33 feet 3 inches; Franconia, 18,000 tons, draft 29 feet 6 inches; Laconia, 18,000 tons, draft 29 feet 6 inches; Cleveland, 17,000 tons, draft 32 feet 8 inches; Cincinnati, 17,000 tons, draft 31 feet 8 inches; and Arabic, 16,000 tons, draft 33 feet 10 inches.

Mr. Chairman, when the project for the 35-foot channel is completed, and it is under contract to be completed in May of this year, there will be ships of large draft coming into Boston Harbor, of a draft that is almost equal to the depth of the harbor, namely, 35 feet. Now, Mr. Chairman, Boston is an exceptionally attractive port for large combination passenger and freight steamers which require the greatest depth of water——

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. I will.

Mr. MOORE. Is that 35-foot channel of Boston Harbor completed?

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. No; it is under contract to be completed in May of this year.

Mr. MOORE. Did the gentleman obtain a survey for the 40-foot depth?

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. Not in this bill; in the bill for 1913 there was a provision for a survey and the engineers have been at Boston and have made a partial report to the board of engineers at Washington.

That partial report was sent back, as I indicated in my remarks yesterday, on the theory expressed by the Board of Engineers here in Washington, that it was not fair to Congress to submit a partial report. That is to say, that Congress ought to have full information about the subject, rather than partial information, before it could be called upon to make the expenditure.

Mr. MOORE. But you are building that toward the 40-foot channel, and you expect to have it some day?

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. We not only expect to have it, but already the State authorities and municipal authorities have built 40-foot channels from the docks and the terminals out in the channel of the harbor.

Mr. MOORE. I will ask the gentleman if he knows of any other port than New York that has a 40-foot channel?

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. No; I do not. I do not know any port other than New York that now needs it.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MURRAY] yield to his colleague?

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. Surely; when I get through with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. GARDNER. I wish to say that we expect to have a 40-foot channel if he remains in Congress, but if he is appointed postmaster I am afraid we will not get it.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. The gentleman is anxious to remain in Congress until this work is done.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, in connection with the remarks made by my colleague from Massachusetts, I will say that while we hope to continue to have the support of the gentleman from Massachusetts, there will probably be others who will take his place that will be equally enthusiastic.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. Unless they are as enthusiastic they have not any chance to take the place.

Mr. Chairman, Boston is 100 nautical miles nearer Europe than any other large port in the United States. Outside of New York, is the only large port frequented by great passenger lines——

Mr. MOORE. Of course, I am not going to object, but I would like the gentleman from Boston to include Philadelphia in the list of those ports.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. I will not put Philadelphia in the list, but I will join in any proper movement to do that.

Mr. MOORE. I would like to have him state, as an object lesson to other ports, what Boston is doing in expending its own money for the improvement of the port.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. Let me call the gentleman's attention to the statement I made in this House yesterday, when I gave a list of the expenditures already made by the municipal authorities in Massachusets for the development of this work.

Mr. MOORE. If the gentleman did that, I will not ask him to do it again; but it seems to me that the House ought to know that Massachusetts is doing this work on its own account, and is spending vast amounts of money to improve these facilities.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. I pointed that out in the House yesterday.

Mr. MOORE. Did you tell the House yesterday what was included in the expenditure of $9,000,000 of State money?

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. Yes, sir. I told the House yesterday that we not only had a half dozen of the most up-to-date and splendidly equipped, constructed, and conducted piers, owned by the Commonwealth, but that we also built a $3,000,000 dry dock.

Mr. MOORE. What is the length of that dry dock?

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. I would say, offhand, about 1,200 feet.

Mr. MOORE. And it will be the largest in the world when completed?

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. The largest in the world. It was built not only after careful study by the local engineers but after an engineer of the Navy Department had been detailed to cooperate with the local authorities in the construction of the most up-to-date dry dock that could be built.

Mr. MOORE. Is there not an arrangement, in fact an agreement, between the State of Massachusetts and the United States Government that the Government can have the use of that dry dock?

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. Yes, sir. And that is a great advantage to the Navy Department, because we have also at Charlestown, at the headwaters of the harbor, the Charlestown Navy Yard, which is an up-to-date navy yard, but was never equipped until the present time for naval purposes. The Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Daniels, has seen the force of our argument that that navy yard should be equipped for shipbuilding purposes, and has recommended it to Congress, and the naval bill will carry an item for equipping that navy yard for shipbuilding purposes of $180,000.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. I will.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I want to inquire whether or not any of these steamship companies that are using the Boston Harbor are contributing anything toward the deepening of the channel or maintaining the channel at a given depth?

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. Right off quickly I may say to you that they are contributing something when they bring their commerce and when they give employment to our citizens.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Are they paying anything directly?

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. I would not be sure as to that. I suppose they are paying for the use of the docks and the various things that are paid for by steamship companies. But certainly whether or not a direct or indirect contribution is made——

Mr. CAMPBELL. I am not trying to be captious. I am simply trying to find out whether there are any steamship companies that use those terminal facilities that pay anything toward their construction and maintenance.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. I will not be sure that there are. I do not know that. I suppose they are paying dock charges.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The question is becoming interesting, I think, because all other transportation companies provide their own facilities. I was just wondering if the transportation companies entirely by water considered themselves exempt from that obligation.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. We are in a peculiar position with respect to this thing. We have tried in our port the arrangement of allowing the transportation companies to own their own docks and their own water front; but we found that that was not a very satisfactory thing to do, and rather than to continue that policy and allow them to have all the water front, as they had where I live, in the Charlestown section of the city, we developed these Commonwealth docks at the other side of the harbor.

Mr. MOORE. Has there not been a general complaint the country over against navigation and steamship companies owning the terminal facilities? Has not that been the chief grievance in all the large cities, that they had too much in the way of terminal facilities, and that the Government ought to step in and free them for general navigation purposes?

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. That is the theory upon which some of us have been working.

Mr. MOORE. I want to ask the gentleman another question—whether the State of Kansas——

Mr. CAMPBELL. Is it not, then, as a matter of fact, in the nature of a subsidy to all these transportation companies that use these terminal facilities for the Government or for the State to furnish them without cost to those people?

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. Well, of course, some of us do not think so. But we are not afraid of it if you call it a "subsidy." Is there anything terrible about the word every time it arises?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Oh, yes. We are to have it thrown in our faces next week as a most awful thing to do—so awful that we ought to abandon our Americanism because of it.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. You and I are part of the "we," are we not?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes; and I should think you and I will probably refuse to believe that it is a subsidy to use our own docks and our own waterways as we see fit.

Mr. MOORE. Is the gentleman familiar with the customs regulations of the port of Boston?

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. Does not that answer, in part, the question of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL]; and would it not also help if you should ask the gentleman from Kansas whether anybody contributes to the maintenance of the Forest Service?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Oh, that is not a transportation service. In Kansas our railroads build all their own facilities and pay for them; and Cow Creek has no docks and harbors. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE. And no navigation.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. I may say, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman's position is incorrect. The September passenger turnover of Boston last year was 23,000 passengers, as compared with 14,000 passengers in September, 1912. If you will just reflect upon those figures, you will see that in the year between 1912 and 1913 there was a tremendous increase from 14,000 up to 23,000 in the number of passengers who used the port of Boston.

The 35-foot channel is inadequate for ships designed in the future for service at the port of Boston and for those already arranged for. A channel of 35 feet at Boston adequately provides only for ships drawing up to 30 feet. There are more steamships now in service in Boston than there were in New York in 1899, at the time the project for a 40-foot channel was entered upon for the port of New York. The Hamburg-American line, in November, 1912, scheduled its four largest steamers for its Boston service. As has been shown, one-sixth of the large vessels in the world are already in service in Boston or under contract to enter the Boston service, the maximum dimensions being: Length, 677.5 feet; draft, 34 feet; tonnage, 34,581. Five new trans-Atlantic passenger lines entered the Boston service in 1913. There are five new steamers advertised for the Boston service in 1914, of which three draw over 33 feet. For 1915 a steamer drawing 34 feet is under contract to enter the Boston service. In the year preceding the adoption of the 40-foot project in New York, in 1898, there were nine steamers in the service at that port drawing 30 feet or over, with a maximum of 32 feet, and the largest in prospect was expected to draw 33 feet.

Mr. Chairman, I have mentioned these things because it seemed to me the case made out for Boston for the establishment of a harbor up to the depth of 40 feet surely is stronger than was the case with New York up to 1899, when it was given 40 feet of water. The Secretary of War under the last administration, Mr. Stimson, made a statement before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce with regard to this service during the last year of his administration as Secretary of War, and during his appearance there, Mr. Chairman, he called attention to the present-day situation of the port of New York, and pointed out that the logical development of the next generation was not at New York, but at Boston and at some other ports, like Philadelphia and Baltimore.

It seems to me when we consider the amount of imports that come through the port of Boston, as contrasted with the amount that comes through at other places, it is clear that we are entitled to this improvement. The table of imports for the calendar year of 1912, as shown by the Monthly Summary of Finance for December, 1912, gives the value of imports, 1912, at Boston as $150,618,223; at Philadelphia, $92,566,087; at New Orleans, $83,354,480; at Baltimore, $27,901,843; at Galveston, $5,937,307.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that the next river and harbor appropriation bill will carry an item for a 40-foot channel at Boston. I believe this bill would now have such an item but for the delay in receiving the report from the Engineer officer of the United States Army at Boston during the past year.

Surely we are justified in urging a 40-channel for Boston. The project for a 35-foot channel will be completed in May of this year.

Boston is the second largest port of the country measured by any test. Boston is second in the total tonnage of shipping that enters American ports; she is second in the number and in the size of great passenger ships requiring deep channels.

But Boston is not second in the zeal of her people—her public officials and her private citizens—to develop her rivers and her harbor that empty easily into the sea.

Those who oppose this bill have frequently asserted the principles that local communities should spend dollar for dollar with the Federal Government in these public improvements. Many amendments have been offered to carry out this idea.

The Commonwealth of Massachusetts spent from 1870 to 1911, or up to the time of the appointment of the directors of the port of Boston, the sum of $5,406,138.79. And this figure does not include $314,303.35 which the people spent on small harbors and secondary channels within the limits of the port of Boston.

The act of the Massachusetts Legislature creating the directors of the port of Boston appropriated $9,000,000 for the development of Boston. More than $15,000,000 have already been spent by the State on Boston Harbor.

I am sure that our record for local expenditures on improvement of our harbor is better than the record of any place in the United States.

We have the commerce, we have the location, we have the policy of spending State money on our harbor improvement rather than waiting for the assistance of the Federal Government.

We are confident, therefore, that the report of the Engineer officer at Boston will favor the 40-foot-channel project, and that this Congress will soon appropriate for this undertaking.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, there has been considerable interest, as shown by the questions asked from the floor, as to the work that the State of Massachusetts has done in the development of deep-water navigation for the port of Boston, and I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting an extract from the last report of the harbor and land commission, and also the report of the directors of the port of Boston, showing exactly what this work consists of.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Pollock Rip Channel, Mass.: Continuing improvement, $125,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. STAFFORD. In looking over the very brief report of 7 pages accompanying this bill appropriating more than $43,000,000 I find a meager reference to the item under consideration. It is one of the items where the committee has departed from the usual rule of following the report of the Chief of Engineers, and I think it is owing to the committee for the chairman or some other member of the committee to explain the reason why we should depart from the adopted policy of following the recommendations of the War Department and launch forth into a project involving at the outset $125,000.

I think the chairman of the committee will agree that there is nothing in the report or in the documents to acquaint the Committee of the Whole with the need of launching into this experiment or venture.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I shall be very glad to make the explanation. I will say that we did not depart from the usual custom in this particular matter, because, although the Chief of Engineers originally submitted no estimate for the continuation of that work this year, he did later on come before us and state orally to us that it would be very desirable to have this additional amount, which they did not in the beginning think necessary.

I would say further that, in my judgment, this is a very important work. It is to accommodate a very important and rapidly growing coastwise commerce going up and down the coast, chiefly from and to Boston. Some two or three years ago a project was furnished to Congress with a view of deepening what is known as Pollock Rip Channel.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman indicate where this channel is located?

Mr. SPARKMAN. It is located off the coast of Massachusetts and a little south of Cape Cod. The purpose is to furnish an inside channel for a distance, at least, around Cape Cod and into Massachusetts Bay.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has the improvement of this channel anything to do with the opening of the Cape Cod Canal?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Nothing directly.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will it be utilized by the traffic that will go through that canal when it is opened?

Mr. SPARKMAN. It will not. It furnishes an inside route, in addition to the outside route, which is always dangerous. Ships going the outside route have to go farther out into the Atlantic. It is said that this Pollock Rip Channel will save not only a good deal of distance—I do not remember just how much; something like a hundred miles, however—but it will make navigation along there much safer than it otherwise would be.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman inform the committee as to the total amount that will be needed for the completion of this project? This is the initial step, is it not?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I have forgotten the exact amount, which is not definitely stated—somewhere between $200,000 and $300,000 more, in addition to the amount carried in this bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. I believe this is the initial appropriation for this project?

Mr. SPARKMAN. No; we appropriated for it a year or two ago, I think, in the bill of 1912. Anyhow, the work has been going on in a tentative manner, and the engineers thought at first that this experimental work had not gone sufficiently far to enable them to determine the advisability of prosecuting it further; but since the estimates for last year—which, as the gentleman knows, came in soon after the fiscal year ended—they have gone far enough, so it seems, to determine that further work is advisable, though not far enough to say to what extent or what the whole would cost.

Mr. STAFFORD. In expending this appropriation will the department engineers follow any survey that has been made heretofore?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Oh, yes. Sometimes it happens, as in this case, that the survey itself can not determine the exact locality of the channel, because they may find obstructions in one place or difficulties that they would not find in another only a short distance away, but having determined in a general way that a given piece of work ought to be done, and about where, they reserve for a later date the final location of the channel. That is what is being done in this case.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then, as I understand the gentleman's last statement, there is discretion on the part of the engineers as to the use of this appropriation? There are no delimitations for its employment.

Mr. SPARKMAN. No; not just that, Mr. Chairman. I will read to the gentleman what the Chief of Engineers says.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes, so as to get a reply to my question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that his time be extended three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SPARKMAN. The last paragraph of the chief's report says:

After due consideration of the above-mentioned reports I concur in the views of the special board and the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, and therefore in carrying out the instructions of Congress I report as follows: That the improvement by the United States of the north or Pollock Rip Channel through the shoals lying near the entrance to Nantucket Sound, by the use of an available Government-owned plant under a single cash appropriation of $250,000, is advisable in order to enable a more definite determination to be made as to what amount of additional work of improvement is advisable. It is also considered advisable that the act of appropriation should make clear the fact that this improvement is only in the nature of a test, upon the results of which the extent of improvement justified is to be determined.

Since this report was made they have found that further experimental work will be needed. Hence this recommendation.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then, as I understand what the gentleman has just said, this is rather investigating work, preliminary to the larger project that may be recommended along definite lines.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes; but while I can not recall just now the opinion of the engineer as to what amount is likely to be required, I can state to the gentleman that, relatively speaking, it will not be large, something, perhaps, like $250,000 or $300,000 more.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then, as I understand, all these items recommended by the committee have been approved by the Chief of Engineers.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Oh, yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. This Pollock Rip item, about which the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] has raised a question, was introduced very largely at the instance of our colleague from Massachusetts, Mr. WILLIAM S. GREENE, and it was because of a very insistent demand upon the part of the mariners who sail from Boston south, and vice versa.

This course, through what is known as Pollock Rip Channel, is positively one of the most dangerous along the New England coast. It is said that more than 50,000,000 tons of commerce pass around this point annually, and that in times of storm, and particularly in the foggy season or during the winter, there is great danger in attempting the short course through.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. May I suggest to the gentleman that he describe the V-shaped character of the curve at that point?

Mr. MOORE. I can not do it technically, but I have seen it described by the mariners. I thank the gentleman for having brought up that point, for it involves some very skillful navigation.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. Are there not two almost right-angle turns in this channel?

Mr. MOORE. There are sharp turns, making it positively dangerous, especially when fog prevails, for two vessels to pass in opposite directions. They may be unable momentarily to distinguish each other or to hear the signals, and are therefore in imminent danger of colliding or running aground.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. Is it not true that many lives as well as millions of dollars worth of property have been lost there by wrecks at one time and another?

Mr. MOORE. Yes; and in attempting to avoid the difficulties I have mentioned. Answering the gentleman's question more broadly, however, the statistics of the Life-Saving Service will attest that beginning at this point and running around Cape Cod during 25 years there have been more than 1,000 marine disasters. The loss of life in these disasters has been tremendous, to say nothing of the loss of property.

Mr. THACHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE. Certainly.

Mr. THACHER. Is it not true that from New Bedford to Boston there are few harbors and that many boats are now obliged to go around Nantucket, and by means of this improvement they can save a considerable distance and time? As I understand it it is about 50 miles from the mouth at Buzzards Bay of the Cape Cod Canal to Pollock Rip Channel at the extreme end of Chatham, the elbow of Cape Cod. This is one of the most dangerous places on the Atlantic coast, where the brave life savers guard the coast and where there have been wrecks from time to time.

As I understand, this improvement which my distinguished colleague, Mr. GREENE, is so much interested in, proposes to remove some of the loose shifting sands and make a better channel for the vast amount of commerce on the Atlantic coast that is going up and down that coast.

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman from Massachusetts is correct. Much work has been done, and the mariners have recently testified that the effect of this work is wholly beneficial and that this appropriation will probably give them the relief they have been seeking for centuries. It was an experimental work to maintain a channel in the open sea, but the effect of the dredging has been to remove the sands, widen the channel, and obliterate this frightful impediment to navigation which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MURRAY] and the other gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. THACHER] have also referred to. There is no more worthy item in the bill than this one.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on this amendment is exhausted, and the Clerk will read.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, what is before the House?

The CHAIRMAN. The motion to strike out the last two words.

Mr. MANN. The Clerk can not read until that motion is disposed of.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas will proceed.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania about this Pollock Rip Channel project. I see from the engineer's report, part 2, 1913, that there was an estimate for an additional fund requiring $250,000. This $250,000 has been appropriated, $125,000 in 1912, and $125,000 in 1913, making $250,000, which, according to the engineer's report, was necessary for this project.

Now they come in here with an appropriation of $125,000 more. I am informed by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MURRAY] that very likely it will take between $250,000 and $500,000 to complete the project. Now, looking at the map, I take it that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] is thoroughly familiar with it, as I understand it is one of his pet hobbies to run a canal from Boston to the Rio Grande. This Cape Cod Canal is 5 miles from the Pollock Rip Channel and saves going around Cape Cod.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I want to say to the gentleman that it is not expected that the completion of the Cape Cod Canal will do away with the necessity for this work.

Mr. MOORE. No; this is open-sea work. You can not stop this work without imperiling the merchant marine that is doing business in the open sea, but it will be fed by the inland waterways that carry freight from port to port. The Cape Cod Canal, however, has no direct connection with the coastal waterways project. That is a private enterprise.

Mr. CALLAWAY. The Cape Cod Canal is a little hole for the little cats, and this project is a big hole for the big cats.

Mr. MOORE. The Cape Cod Canal is a worthy enterprise, not being conducted by the United States. Not a dollar of the Government's money is being used to build that canal. It is being built by a private corporation, for the use of which it expects to collect tolls. The head of the corporation is August Belmont, a distinguished and progressive citizen, who is trying to do something for his country and at the same time make an honest penny on the side.

Mr. CALLAWAY. And ultimately to sell it to the Government. Does not your intercoastal project contemplate taking the Cape Cod Canal in?

Mr. MOORE. No.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Are you going to dig an intercoastal canal further in?

Mr. MOORE. If the gentleman would read more of the information published about this matter, he would not get so mixed up in his facts.

Mr. CALLAWAY. The adjustable facts change so very rapidly.

Mr. MOORE. The Cape Cod Canal is not a part of the intercoastal system of waterways. It is a private enterprise to build a canal that will save a sailing distance of 75 miles or thereabouts over the most dangerous stretch of coast in New England. I told the gentleman and the House a little while ago there have been 1,000 marine disasters in this region, carrying down untold human lives during the last 25 years.

Mr. CALLAWAY. But they were inside and not outside. I find in looking at the figures that 66⅔ per cent of those disasters occurred inside, and 33 per cent only have occurred out in the open sea.

Mr. MOORE. But the gentleman is entirely mistaken about that. I can produce a map of the coast so dotted to indicate disasters that you can scarcely see the white background for the black spots.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Where are they? They are inside, on your intracoastal water line.

Mr. MOORE. They are not on the inside at all.

Mr. CALLAWAY. They are not on the open sea.

Mr. MOORE. Why, an accident will occur on a railroad or an elevator inside, but there are a great many accidents that do occur outside that might be avoided if the Government were a little more liberal in its expenditures for inside improvements.

Mr. THACHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Texas yield?

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, not now. I want to ask a further question of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I see here that this Pollock Rip Channel would be about 5 miles from the Cape Cod Canal, and then about 7 miles inside of that I see another line that is made to indicate where they intend to dig this intracoastal waterway——

Mr. MOORE. That is correct as to projects only. I do not certify to the distances.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Making three canals back through there within 7½ miles of each other.

Mr. MOORE. Does the gentleman understand that there is an intensified population in New England? Does he understand there are more than 30,000,000 people along the Atlantic coast line? Does he understand that those 30,000,000 people have to do business on less than one-quarter of the railroad mileage of the country? Has the gentleman posted himself about the congestion, or is his idea of area so vast that he can not comprehend what it means to live in a congested center?

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, it is my judgment that the population has congested in those localities because of the expenditure of money from the Federal Treasury.

Mr. MOORE. I could make some comparisons that would enlighten the gentleman on that score, but I do not care to do so now.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. More than ever before, Mr. Chairman, has it been borne in on me that a little learning is a dangerous thing, and that it is a bad practice to come into the House of Representatives with a little learning about a particular proposition.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a question right there?

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. Just let me yield first to the chairman of the committee, Mr. SPARKMAN, whom I see on his feet.

Mr. DONOVAN. Of course the point of order can be made against the gentleman.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask if debate on this paragraph has not been exhausted?

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. But I understand that the pro forma amendment has been withdrawn.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman state his point of order?

Mr. DONOVAN. That the gentleman has already spoken upon this subject and is not entitled to speak a second time.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. But that is not so.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is made that debate on the paragraph is exhausted.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I do not understand that to be correct. I understand the pro forma amendment to have been withdrawn, and I renew it, and I think I have a right to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, if there is any meritorious proposition in this entire bill, it is certainly this proposition about Pollock Rip Channel; and if the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY] is interested in getting a correct statement in respect to it, I hope he will listen to what we have to say. He protested yesterday against appropriations for rivers on the ground that no commerce would be served by any appropriation that would be made. We have here a proposition that affects 20,000,000 tons of commerce every year, because the statement of the report from which he read, and he will find it on page 106, is to the effect that it is estimated that a commerce of more than 20,000,000 short tons annually will be benefited if it be practicable to construct and maintain the proposed channel. Certainly, on the score of benefiting commerce, this is a most meritorious project, and even if no commerce were to be benefited, I would still give my support to the proposition because of the saving of human lives that is involved.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Why does the gentleman not think one canal would do the work instead of three, built within 5 miles of each other?

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. That is just the gentleman's trouble. He does not differentiate between these canals. The Cape Cod Canal is, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] said, a private enterprise, privately constructed, and privately owned, and it is going to charge tolls on the ships that use it.

Mr. CALLAWAY. And the gentleman's proposition is to parallel it within 5 miles with two Government canals within 5 to 7 miles of each other?

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. Why should the ships that ply the sea between Boston and New York, between Boston and Baltimore, between Boston and the southern ports, be made to go through the Cape Cod Canal and pay tolls to swell the purse and reimburse the pocket of men who privately own it? Is the gentleman in favor of forcing the men who own the ships that ply the sea to go through a privately owned canal? Is the gentleman working in the interest of a great New England railroad monopoly, that has control of the railroad situation, that may have control of this canal, and that will be able by the gentleman's plan to increase the freight rates on the ships that go along the sea routes from New York and Boston to southern places? Is that the plan of the gentleman? If it is, stay where you are, because the logical result of your proposition is to increase the freight charges to the shipper of New England and to the consumers in your State of Texas and all the Southern States. [Applause.]

Mr. CALLAWAY. Is the gentleman done?

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. Yes; I am done, and you can not answer it, because it is true.

Mr. FREAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. FREAR. Is it an answer to ask why the boats traveling around can not take the ocean? Is it impossible to go out on the ocean as they have been doing for all these years?

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. Just look at the map before you try to answer the question and see the location of the channels. These channels come down in this way outside the course. I will describe it.

Mr. FREAR. Why can not the vessels travel around Cape Cod out at sea?

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. Because it would be very dangerous.

Mr. FREAR. That is it. Is there anything to answer? Why is it necessary to go through this particular channel——

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. I do not know that——

Mr. FREAR. I know; that is the point.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. The gentleman can take his own time to answer the question; but how long are these outside routes?

Mr. FREAR. It is immaterial; but it has been traveled all these years. However, I will answer in my own time.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. All right. But I know the fact is that, with all its perils, with all the hardships, these mariners are compelled to take a very dangerous route. It is not a matter of choice. The testimony of the captains who came before our committee was that they were compelled by trade conditions and by the customs of the service to take this route. It would come down to a point off Cape Cod and make a turn at one place of 70 degrees and make a turn at another place of 90 degrees. These turns are very dangerous in time of storms, because there is no harbor to make, and the ship commanders must make the turns under very difficult conditions. They have a short distance to travel—less than a mile or two in which to make this turn—and the fact of the matter is that frequently, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania has stated, many ships are lost in this place. Lives have been lost and commerce has been destroyed because of conditions that too long have continued here at Pollock Rip Shoal. Let us make this channel there, and we shall surely save scores of lives and millions of money. [Applause.]

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. DONOVAN. No; I want to reserve the right to object. The Chair a moment ago stated he allowed the gentleman to proceed as I claimed out of order, and, of course, his remarks must have been out of order. Here is the rule:

> No man may speak more than once on the same bill on the same day.

Now I withdraw my objection.

The CHAIRMAN. There is nothing in the objection to begin with. The Chair understands the rules of the House.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, the rule has no application to the five-minute debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that.

Mr. MANN. Of course the Chair understood it and everybody else except the gentleman from Connecticut, who did not.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I rise simply to answer that part of the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MURRAY] in which he imputes incorrect motives to those gentlemen who differ with him in this appropriation bill. I understand the gentleman explains conditions which must be met by the use of this proposed canal paralleling, as we are also told, a private canal only 5 miles distant.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. It does not parallel it at all.

Mr. FREAR. That is the question; but we have been so told.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. That is the trouble; the gentleman is understanding a lot of information that is not so.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I will not yield to further interruption at this moment. I have in mind, Mr. Chairman, that for many years and centuries mariners have been enabled to carry on their commerce across the seas without danger, without——

Mr. CALLAWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. I yield to the gentleman; I welcome it.

Mr. CALLAWAY. The truth of the matter is it cuts off a little island and the ships yet have to go around Cape Cod way, whereas the Cape Cod Canal strikes in 5 miles from where this canal cuts in, and it is to save that extra 5 miles to the shipper.

Now, the intercoastal waterway they have outlined on the map is about 5 miles farther inland. That is to be built by the Government. Then they are to have a private canal that proposes to do business with the public, with a public canal dug by the Government on each side of it. That is the showing made here by the map on this intercoastal waterway proposition. It does not exactly run parallel, but runs a little that way and a little this way [indicating].

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that it will shorten the discussion in any way, but I want to say that there is no live proposition before us now to construct an intercoastal canal north of the harbor of New York, all the balance of them having been turned down by the engineers.

Mr. TREADWAY. I wish to say, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. FREAR. I resented, Mr. Chairman, the statement that we are not acting in good faith in making these inquiries, and it seems to me——

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. I only showed the result of the action of certain gentlemen who are members of this committee at certain times to do certain things. I do not say that they intend to do that, but the result of their action is to play into the hands of the railroad monopoly in New England.

Mr. FREAR. It may be a vessel monopoly, for all that Members on this floor know. We are asking for information here, and I believe the members of the committee should give us the information, and that is the purpose of my reply to the gentleman. I have no interest particularly in this proposition, because I have given it no examination.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I realize that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] is perfectly sincere in his effort to secure information, and if it is possible for me as a member of the committee, I shall be very glad to assist in that move.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I will yield to the gentleman, but I wish to take this matter up directly.

Mr. DONOVAN. I wish to find out what became of the $250,000 that was appropriated by the Government for this work?

Mr. TREADWAY. That is involving another question. I shall be very glad to refer to that in just a moment.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I will answer that question by saying that most of it has been expended.

Mr. DONOVAN. The Government report shows, Mr. Chairman, that $160,000 is unexpended.

Mr. TREADWAY. I will say that is under the date of July 1, 1913; it does not show the money expended last year.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I would like to answer the gentleman's inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] yield to the chairman of the committee?

Mr. TREADWAY. I do.

Mr. SPARKMAN. On the 30th of June last there was so much money—I have not the amount—that was not used, but a great deal of that money has been spent since.

Mr. DONOVAN. I will say to the committee that $160,000 of it was not expended on the 1st of June.

Mr. SPARKMAN. The greater part of it has been expended.

Mr. TREADWAY. That was all expended after June 30, 1913. There was no balance for the work last fall, and this is for the continuance for another year of the amount that the engineers estimated should be used in that work. Now, as regards the amount of shipping which passed through there last year, as my colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. MURRAY] has said, it represented 20,000,000 short tons, and there passed by daylight 4,238 craft. I submit that the amount of property involved and the number of lives which that enormous amount of traffic represents are entitled to every possible protection that we can give. There have been serious accidents there, and gentlemen who appeared before the committee on January 22 testified as to the great danger involved in passing through this section.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY]?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes; I yield.

Mr. CALLAWAY. If this channel is cut as proposed by this bill, a vessel passing by that route would still have to come out in the open sea and would be subject to the same danger as if it went around the island.

Mr. TREADWAY. It will make a separate straight channel rather than a Z, as described by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MURRAY]. It is to straighten the channel and permit of the long tows being towed directly rather than at a right angle. I think the gentleman from Texas, with his great capacity and learning, ought to comprehend that it would be very much easier and safer to proceed through water straightway than it would be to turn at right angles when you are towing several boats or not towing them.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Well, this does not do away with the crooked turn you have to make around Cape Cod.

Mr. TREADWAY. It is to do away with the crooked channel at that point known as Pollock Rip. The gentleman is confusing in his mind the intercoastal waterways——

Mr. CALLAWAY. No; I am not. I am looking at the map.

Mr. TREADWAY. It has absolutely nothing to do with it. It has nothing to do with the private enterprise of building the Cape Cod Canal. It is simply to make safer the passage between Boston and New York or any other southbound place.

Now then, in relation to the question asked by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] as to why they can not go out into the open sea, I will say, of course you could go over to Liverpool and start back if you are going from Boston to New York, if that would be a commercial way to do business, but the testimony of people who appeared before our committee is to the effect that they already lose 12 hours in passing over that dangerous shoal. I will ask if it is not an object to save that length of time in the enormous amount of passing that there is along that shore?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. THACHER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph be ended in 10 minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will not the gentleman withhold his request until the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. THACHER], who has been referred to several times already, has a chance to make an explanation?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I had him in my mind in making the request.

Mr. THACHER. I want but two minutes. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. Questions may be asked of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE]. I hope the gentleman from Florida will give the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] an opportunity.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Very well.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. THACHER] is recognized.

Mr. THACHER. Mr. Chairman, I live on Cape Cod, not many miles from Pollock Rip Channel. As evidence of the stormy conditions which we have sometimes in Pollock Rip Channel, I think the mild storm of discussion that has swept over the House this March morning is a very faint example of those stormy conditions which sometimes prevail in Pollock Rip Channel. If our distinguished friend from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY], whose judgment I value highly on many subjects, and our friend from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] would come down to Cape Cod some time I will show them a storm that will make their teeth tremble, if they come down at the right time.

The situation is this: Certain Members have confused to some extent the project of an intercoastal canal from Narragansett Bay to Massachusetts Bay, not yet built, and the Cape Cod Canal, a private enterprise, that will cost about $14,000,000, to be opened next July, with the improvement of this Pollock Rip Channel.

Mr. CALLAWAY. The fact that the Cape Cod Canal is being built by private enterprise indicates evidently that the promoters of that enterprise expect to carry some freight through there to pay the tolls?

Mr. THACHER. Yes; they expect to make some money.

Mr. CALLAWAY. And compete, then, with this channel which the Government is digging here, given to the public?

Mr. THACHER. That is a fair question to ask. There are 25,000,000 tons of freight that pass around Cape Cod annually. A large amount of that freight is carried in boats from New York to Boston, and boats from Philadelphia, Savannah, Baltimore, and other ports. A good many of these will go through the Cape Cod Canal. It will be used by both sets of vessels, sail and steam. A considerable portion will continue to use the Pollock Rip Channel.

Mr. CALLAWAY. It must be cheaper to go through the canal and pay those tolls than to go through the open sea.

Mr. THACHER. The traffic will stand it, I presume, and yet the rates will be low. So far as the intercoastal canal is concerned, we have not taken that up at all yet.

Mr. CALLAWAY. But you will take it up later, will you not?

Mr. THACHER. We will go slowly on that, my friend.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Have you not got an intercoastal waterway here from Boston to Beaufort, S. C.?

Mr. THACHER. I want to see the Cape Cod Canal show what it will do first. I believe that it will be a benefit. I am advocating this and also the Pollock Rip Channel improvement. I think both are meritorious enterprises. I am heartily in favor of the pending proposition.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I am somewhat familiar with this project for the improvement of the Pollock Rip Channel. For a number of years it has been under consideration. Two years ago there was a public hearing held at Newport, R. I., before an especial board of engineers appointed under authority of Congress, consisting of Col. Frederic V. Abbot, Col. John Willis, and Lieut. Col. Edward Burr, in order that the wisdom and experience of these three officials of high standing might be utilized; and the matter was gone into very thoroughly, and a full report was finally made. When the hearing was held, it was attended by vessel owners, representatives of the Masters, Mates, and Pilots' Association, and many others representing the shipping interests of the entire coast. This important improvement affects not alone the shipping interests of Massachusetts but it embraces the interests of the entire coast from Boston to Florida, and thence along the coast to the entrance to the Panama Canal. The tortuous channel that had existed in this locality for a great number of years had long been recognized as one of the most dangerous and treacherous portions of the entire coast. On account of its shifting sands, frequent heavy gales, and strong tides the engineers had previously objected to making any change in the existing conditions, for the reason that they thought there was grave doubt of the possibility of the improvement being permanently valuable. But after this hearing was held and important testimony was given by shipmasters who had traversed these dangerous waters from boyhood, the special board united in the recommendation that $250,000 should be expended for the purpose of determining the feasibility of the improvement of this great waterway. When the matter came up for consideration before the House Committee on Rivers and Harbors the committee acted favorably upon the recommendation of the Board of Engineers, and the sum of $250,000 was included in the rivers and harbors bill for the year ending June 30, 1913. When the bill went over to the Senate it was discussed for some time there, and it was thought then that it would not be possible to expend more than $125,000 before another bill would be presented, so that the amount was reduced to $125,000, and that sum was appropriated. After the expenditure of that amount it was determined by the Board of Engineers that the project was entirely feasible; that it was very wise, in the interest of the commerce of the entire Atlantic coast, to have this project further extended; and in the last year's rivers and harbors bill the second installment of $125,000 was carried, which completed the $250,000 first authorized.

I do not now represent that part of Massachusetts which is included in this Pollock Rip Channel proposition, and I would not be on this floor advocating it as a special privilege for the benefit of Massachusetts or for the benefit of any special district, for I realize, as the engineers realize and every person who has sailed through that channel realizes—and there are more vessels going through this waterway than at any other point on the entire Atlantic coast—that this is a national project, of national importance, and of equal interest to every person on the entire coast from the State of Maine down to the entrance of the Panama Canal. Otherwise I would not speak one word in behalf of this improvement.

Its feasibility has been demonstrated thus far by the engineers, but they concluded that they could not complete this improvement without further authority from Congress, after expending the $250,000 already provided; and so, upon the recommendation of the engineers, a hearing was held before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors this year, and the men interested in the commerce on the Atlantic coast appeared before the committee. After the hearing had been concluded the engineer in charge of the work, located in the Chief of Engineers' office here in Washington, indorsed the further extension of the work. It also has the indorsement of every person who has been connected with the investigation of the project in official life, and it is really one of the wisest propositions that has ever been presented to this body. There is nothing about it that ought to cause anyone to object to the appropriation of $125,000 included in this bill.

The investigations thus far made in the prospective improvement of the Pollock Rip Channel have revealed conditions that were not supposed to exist.

The dredging it was supposed would only result in the removal of sand that the tides and winds would cause to immediately flow back into and obstruct the channel. But, instead, the dredged material has proven to be large-sized gravel, which it is confidently believed will make the work of a permanent character.

The improved channel it is proposed shall be 11 miles long, 1 mile wide, and 30 feet deep, and it is proposed to so construct that the strong winds and tides prevailing there shall be utilized to keep the channel clear.

This work is being carried on by the dredger Navesink, under Government supervision, and it will undoubtedly be completed at less cost proportionately than any work undertaken heretofore in many years.

It will mean the saving of human lives and in loss of vessel property, which will prove to be of a very marvelous and important character, that will justify the proposed expenditure, independent of the immense value to the maritime interests along the entire Atlantic coast.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving harbor at New Haven, Conn.: Continuing improvement and for maintenance, $70,000.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, may I move that the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. REILLY] may have permission to extend in the RECORD a statement regarding the item in this bill for the improvement of his harbor in Connecticut. As gentlemen know, Representative REILLY is now having an indefinite leave of absence on account of illness. This item was put in at his suggestion and at his urgent request, and I would like to have permission granted to enable him to make a statement in the RECORD in regard to it.

Mr. MANN. I suppose that statement will be put in the RECORD so as to inform us how he will vote on this project?

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. I suppose he will be able to vote on it on the final passage.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MURRAY]?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Connecticut River, Conn.: For maintenance of improvement below Hartford, $15,000.

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of this bill. Of interest to the district which I have the honor to represent is that provision which has for its object the continued improvement of the Connecticut River, small though the appropriation may be. I am in favor of all waterway improvements, and in particular legislation which tends toward the full and complete development of the Connecticut River, because of the highly important results to the commercial interests of Connecticut sure to follow such development. The demands of the cities and towns bordering the river for ample facilities for navigation from Long Island Sound to Holyoke, in order that they may benefit by a saving in freight charges on coal, lumber, tobacco, farm and manufactured products, and other commodities that may be transported by water, should be given the consideration which these legitimate demands deserve.

Connecticut is distinctively a manufacturing State, although agricultural pursuits yielding millions of dollars annually are carried on there. The importance of improved transportation facilities by water can not be overestimated when the great benefit sure to result in favor of the State's industries—and indirectly in favor of consumers—is borne in mind. A large number of communities will be directly affected by the development of this river. Between Hartford and Long Island Sound, a distance of 52 miles, there are 14 points along the river at which the regular steamers of the Hartford and New York Transportation Co. usually stop. They are Hartford, Glastonbury, South Glastonbury, Middletown, Middle Haddam, Rock Landing, East Haddam or Goodspeed Landing, Hadlyme, Deep River, Broadway Landing, Elys Wharf, Essex, Lyme, Saybrook Point. In addition to these points there are a number of others where stops are occasionally made. Above Hartford, located along the river, are such prosperous Connecticut manufacturing and farming towns as Windsor, South Windsor, East Windsor, Windsor Locks, Suffield, and Enfield. Every one of these towns and cities is in direct line for the benefits which would result from a general opening of the river. Every dollar spent on the project would be in the nature of an investment, the dividends of which must eventually return to the people.

At the present time the river from the Sound to Hartford is principally used by steamers and barges of the Hartford & New York Transportation Co. From Hartford to Springfield and Holyoke but little use is made of the river; launches and small craft utilize it to limited extent. Some coal has been carried to Springfield by the Springfield Navigation Co. by means of small barges which could pass through the restricted locks and canal at Windsor Locks. It is understood that the company above mentioned is much interested in the project for increased facilities for navigation and is prepared to build additional barges for the transportation of coal as soon as conditions will warrant.

Historical records show that a hundred or more years ago elaborate plans were commenced for the development of the Connecticut River. A system of canals was proposed, and charters were secured in Vermont, Massachusetts, and Connecticut. Under the Connecticut charter, which was granted in 1824, the recipient was given permission to widen the channel of the river and remove obstructions from that part of the river between the bridge at Hartford and the city of Springfield. Authority to construct canals was also given. Extensive improvements were made at that time, and it is said that at that time the Connecticut River entered upon its period of greatest commercial activity. According to the records, the whole river was open to navigation from Hartford, Conn., to Wells River, Vt. The river is about 345 miles in length. Freight was carried in flatboats with capacity of 30 to 40 tons.

Authorities who have made a study of the history of the river state that the invention of the steamboat and the steam engine sounded the doom of commercial activity on the Connecticut River above Hartford. The application of steam to the problem of transportation turned attention for the time being away from the subject of river development, and as a result the new method supplanted the old. Steamboats were tried on the river, but the river was not in shape to meet the needs of navigation; the boats were too large to pass through the locks and canals then in existence, and were of too great draft to allow of safe navigation in the upper river. The result was that locks and canals were abandoned for traffic use, and the river above Hartford was practically closed to commerce.

The Connecticut River rises in the extreme northern portion of New Hampshire and flows in a southerly direction between that State and Vermont, forming the boundary line between these two States, and through Massachusetts and Connecticut, emptying into Long Island Sound at Saybrook, about 30 miles to the eastward of New Haven and about 14 miles to the westward of New London. Its entire watershed is said to be about 11,000 square miles, of which only about 850 square miles are below Hartford. Most of the important tributaries of the Connecticut River join it above Hartford. Below Hartford there are only five which may be considered of any importance, and none of these are of any commercial importance. The Park or Hog River enters the Connecticut from the westward at Hartford about 4,100 feet below the highway bridge, and the Hockanum River flows into it from the eastward about 5,000 feet below the mouth of the Park River. At Middletown, Little River flows in from the westward; and just above East Haddam the Salmon River and a short distance above Essex Eight Mile River empty in from the eastward.

The citizens of the Connecticut Valley, not only in their own interest but in behalf of the commercial prosperity of the whole State, desire the opening to navigation of the Connecticut River. With our Connecticut waterways properly developed the saving on freight bills would be tremendous.

The Boston Chamber of Commerce in a recent report showed that the annual freight bill of New England on coal alone was $70,000,000. The actual value of this coal at the mines was but $30,000,000. Hence it costs more than $2 to bring every dollar's worth of coal into New England, according to the Boston Chamber of Commerce. How long can New England expect to do business under this handicap and still keep up its competition with an aggressive interior and a booming West, so much more favorably situated with regard to the fuel supply and the market?

An idea of the possibilities in freight traffic development on the Connecticut River is given in an extract from the report of the Chief of Engineers of the Army made public recently. The report showed that the value of freight transported on the river during 1912 was $39,419,594.70. The tonnage was 617,981 short tons, mainly coal, lumber, building materials, fertilizer, petroleum products, and miscellaneous steamboat freight.

We are only keeping pace with other eastern cities in asking for improved waterways. We find the same request coming with emphasis which amounts to a demand from cities like Albany and Troy, on the Hudson River; Haverhill and Lowell, on the Merrimac; Wilmington and Philadelphia and Trenton, on the Delaware; Paterson and Newark, on the Passaic; New Brunswick, on the Raritan; Pawtucket and Providence, on the Providence; Fall River and Taunton, on the Taunton; Baltimore, on the Patapsco; Richmond, on the James; likewise Charleston, Savannah, and Jacksonville. They have only to point to the inland European cities, like Manchester, Amsterdam, and Hamburg, to prove at once the wisdom of providing canals or waterways to supplement the work of the railroads and to afford competitive relief for the output of the farms and factories.

The completion of the Panama Canal is near at hand, a glorious proof of American skill and engineering, and we are proud of it. The benefits to commerce are sure to follow swiftly, and people who fail to place themselves in line to receive directly or indirectly a share of those benefits will have only themselves to blame.

The inhabitants of the river cities and towns are not the only ones who would receive the benefits of river development. The easier the path from producer to consumer the lower the cost to the latter. We hear much about the abandoned farms of some of our New England States. The problem of the owners of neglected eastern lands can be simplified by solving the problem of transportation. It is the problem of the ability of the producer to get to market, a problem resulting from the concentration of population and business activity along the lines of the railroads, while vast stretches of country have suffered because the waterway's opportunities have not been grasped. Improved waterways assure easier means for the farmer and fruit grower to reach the consumer, and spell more dollars and greater population for the smaller towns. Likewise will waterways development cut down distance to a minimum and bring nearer the fruit growers of the South, the coal fields of Pennsylvania, and the timberlands of the West.

An idea of the large number of people who are in position to be benefited by the development of the river is given by referring to the population of the cities and towns concerned. The communities in Connecticut interested in the river improvements have approximately 600,000 inhabitants. They are in the front rank among New England's manufacturing towns, and their products, which are so diversified that they range all the way from an ordinary pin to an automobile, are shipped to all sections of the civilized world.

These communities contain some of the most productive farms to be found in New England. They also contain thousands of prosperous mercantile concerns and hundreds of thousands of consumers, all of whom are sure to benefit directly by the extension of navigation on the Connecticut River.

Another feature of the inland waterways development in which Connecticut is interested is that of the canals planned for certain localities within the State and for which surveys are authorized in this bill. I look forward to a favorable report on these canal projects, to be followed by definite action.

Several bills have been introduced in this session of Congress, all aiming for the development of the Connecticut River. House bill 7592 calls for an appropriation of $1,000,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, for improving the river from Long Island Sound to Hartford, with a view to securing a channel of width and depth suitable to accommodate the present and future demands of commerce.

Another measure introduced in the Sixty-third Congress—House bill 6437—calls for an appropriation of $1,015,600, to be expended for the improvement of the river between Hartford and Holyoke, Mass., with a view to securing a channel 12 feet in depth and in accordance with the plan recommended by the Board of Engineers as set forth in House Document No. 323, Fifty-ninth Congress, second session, and House Document No. 818, Sixty-first Congress, second session. These proposed amendments are subject to these provisions, according to the bill: That a suitable lock and dam for surmounting the Enfield Rapids be constructed by private or corporate interests, free of cost to the United States; that navigation through said lock shall be free from any toll or charge; that those constructing the lock and dam assume all responsibility for claims for damages that may arise from flowage rights, from injury to water power, or from any other source; that after construction the lock shall become the property of the United States and shall be maintained and operated at the expense of the Federal Government.

There is also a bill before the present session (H. R. 27989) which provides that Congress shall give assent to a concern organized and doing business under the laws of the State of Connecticut to relocate its Enfield Dam and to construct, maintain, and operate such relocated dam. The bill also provides that the company shall build, coincidently with the construction of the dam, a lock of such kind and size as shall conveniently and safely accommodate the present and prospective commerce of the river, and at the completion of this lock the company building same shall convey it to the United States free of cost, together with title of such land as may be required for approaches to the lock. It is proposed that the lock shall be operated by the United States for the benefit of navigation, the power for lighting and operating the locks to be furnished free of charge by the company to the Government.

With the increased population and continued industrial development the demand for water power is growing rapidly. It would be difficult to estimate the great advantages to the industries of Connecticut and Massachusetts, which are bound to follow when the proposed project opens up for Connecticut and Massachusetts manufacturers a new source of power.

I view with much satisfaction the attitude of the administration on this subject.

Secretary of War Garrison's letter to Chairman ADAMSON, of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, made public a few weeks ago, embodies the water-power policy of the national administration as it has been approved by President Wilson. In this letter Secretary Garrison said:

Legally speaking, I do not think there can be any dispute that with respect to the question of power the position of the Federal Government is paramount. Nothing can be done without its consent, and only that can be done to which it consents. There is no justification for a policy of do-nothing. Therefore the question is, What is the wise policy to adopt that something may be done? The interests to be considered, and the equities with respect thereto, I view as follows:

First, of course, there are the communities which will benefit by the utilization of the water power developed by the placing of dams in navigable streams. Next is the immediate sovereign over them, which would direct this matter and have power with respect thereto, were it not for the paramount power above alluded to, which resides in the Federal Government. Finally there is the Federal Government with absolute power, by reason of its ability, legally to prevent the doing of anything without its consent.

Therefore the proper solution seems to me to be to adopt a policy which recognizes the equitable sphere of each of those in interest. I conceive the equitable sphere of the Federal Government to be to see to it that this great public utility, wherever availed of, should be availed of in a way that will benefit the greatest number under the most favorable terms possible, and in doing so to recognize the justice—not as a matter of law—of the State entity or sovereignty receiving a revenue from the operation of this public utility within its confines, and regulating it for the benefit of its people.

There is no doubt as to the sentiment of the cities and towns along the river; it is practically unanimous in favor of improved waterways transportation with its inevitable commercial advantages.

It will, therefore, be seen that the proposed bills provide for the development of Connecticut River from Long Island Sound to the source. Those who have full confidence in the merits of the question of extending navigation on the Connecticut are convinced that complete development is the proper course to follow.

Up to June 30, 1912, there was no adopted project for the improvement of the river between Hartford and Holyoke. From a point a short distance above the railroad bridge at Hartford to the lower lock in the canal at Windsor Locks there is an available depth for navigation of about 5 feet, although at the extreme low-water periods there is less depth. From the upper end of the canal to the head of navigation at Holyoke there is a substantial depth of 7 feet.

The total expenditures for the improvement of the Connecticut River by the Federal Government to the close of the fiscal year which ended June 30, 1911, was $703,721.91.

While barge transportation is the most that we can hope for on the river above Hartford, nevertheless Connecticut in general, and Hartford and vicinity in particular, are fully aware of the industrial and commercial importance of Springfield, Holyoke, Chicopee, and West Springfield. They realize the advantages of waterways improvements which contemplate the needs of those communities.

Mr. MOORE. Is it not the belief of the people of New England that if the Connecticut River were opened up above Hartford they would be able to get their coal at a dollar a ton less than they do to-day?

Mr. LONERGAN. Yes.

I appreciate the interest which the Rivers and Harbors Committee has taken in the pending bills providing for improvements of the Connecticut River and hope that before the next session of Congress official investigation will establish the necessity of the proposed improvements and that Congress will appropriate funds sufficient to insure the development of the Connecticut River so that it may be open to all transportation lines and crafts.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Sheepshead Bay, N. Y.: For maintenance, $3,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The last few items which have been read all relate to appropriations for the maintenance of improvements already made by the Government. I think it is perfectly proper for the Government to make appropriations for the maintenance of these improvements which it has constructed. On the other hand, the question comes up whether the commerce itself, having received the benefit of an improvement out of the Federal Treasury, should pay for the cost of the maintenance of that improvement. It is urged that in other places, or at least in one other place, the commerce of the United States should be charged for the maintenance of the improvements. If it should be charged at one place, why should it not be charged at these places in New York? The great metropolitan papers of New York insist that the Government shall make appropriations for the maintenance out of the Federal Treasury of improvements already made for the benefit of New York Harbor, but that the Government must charge commerce for the maintenance of improvements at some other place.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving East River and Hell Gate, N. Y., in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 188, Sixty-third Congress, first session, $500,000: Provided, That so much as may be necessary of this and any other appropriations made for specific portions of New York Harbor and its immediate tributaries may be allotted by the Secretary of War for the maintenance of these waterways by the collection and removal of drift.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to quote from the governor of New York to show what the general idea of that section of country is as to expenditures for rivers and harbors.

Mr. WILSON of Florida. Is that the present governor?

Mr. CALLAWAY. The present governor; yes. This is a speech made by the present governor, Martin H. Glynn, before the National River and Harbor Congress at Washington, D. C., December 4, 1913. He says:

In the shoal canals of the Tennessee River near Chattanooga the United States Government made an expenditure for improvements representing a cost of $11.91 for every ton of freight carried through the canal.

* * * * * * *

For every ton of freight carried through the lock of the Wabash River at Grand Rapids, Mich., the Federal Government has laid out an expenditure of $56.

* * * * * * *

The Federal Government has spent $20 a ton for every ton of freight carried on the Big Sandy River and its forks.

* * * * * * *

In 1908 the United States Government spent in interest and in maintenance the incredible sum of $183 for each ton of freight carried on the Red River between its mouth and Fulton, Ark.

Now, the governor of New York does not complain of these expenditures. He does not say that they are excessive. He does not say that they are an outrage upon the people of this country, but he says:

This same ratio of expenditure upon the Hudson would have meant that in the last 100 years Uncle Sam should have spent $7,000,000,000 instead of $5,000,000 upon the Hudson River.

I quote that to show what the idea of these New Yorkers is as to the way the money ought to be shoveled out of the Federal Treasury on these projects. He does not complain of the appropriations which have been made; he does not say they are excessive; he does not say they ought to be cut; but his only complaint is that they have not done the same proportional amount of work or expended the same proportional amount of money in the harbor of New York and on the Hudson River and at other places up there as they have on the Red River—$183 for every ton of freight moved on the river.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that this statement was not made by a Member of Congress nor made in the Congress of the United States, which only has the power of appropriating. It was simply a statement made at a convention of delegates from all over the United States, and the governor, intelligent man that he is, was not called upon to give his opinion as to whether the expenditure had been exorbitant or unjustifiable. I do not think my friend will charge that he was responsible for this.

Mr. CALLAWAY. No; he was not. He was just telling what we had done to the Federal Treasury for projects in other places, and his complaint was that we had not done the same thing to the Federal Treasury for New York and its waters that we did for the Red River.

Mr. GOULDEN. He was merely making a comparison between those improvements and that of the Hudson River, and as a matter of justice and fair play he was right.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I oppose the amendment to strike out the last word. I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY] to the fact that no appropriation is carried in this bill for any of the projects which he has just criticized mentioned by the governor of New York. There is no appropriation carried in this bill for any of them.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Do you mean to say there is no appropriation for the Red River?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. None.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Or for the Tennessee River?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. None for the Red River, none for the Muscle Shoals on the Tennessee, none for the Wabash, and none for the Big Sandy.

Mr. CALLAWAY. When did you quit appropriating for these rivers?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. There is nothing carried in this bill for them.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I want to make a brief statement, to show the utter injustice of the gentleman's criticism.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Do not accuse me. That was the governor of New York.

Mr. MOON. Then the governor of New York did not tell the real facts. The statement is utterly incorrect, I do not care who made it. As shown by the reports of the Waterways Commission, the Tennessee River has not only sustained itself in tonnage, but it has reduced or forced down the rates of the railroad companies. It is carrying out and accomplishing all that is expected to be accomplished by river improvements. The gentleman spoke of the shoals just below Chattanooga. There were 40 miles of shoals just below Chattanooga, but the river has been improved there, so that there is now practically a lake in the Tennessee River from the Cincinnati bridge, crossing above Chattanooga, down to the lock and dam, a distance of 36 to 40 miles, with a depth of from 6 to 40 feet. And what has the Government of the United States contributed toward this improvement? It has contributed $212,000, while the private citizens of Tennessee and New York and other places have contributed $9,000,000 of money to perform this service for the Government of the United States, a service that the Government was bound to perform to carry out its duties with reference to the rivers and harbors of this country.

Such idle nonsense as stated in this paper is thoroughly demonstrated to be untrue by the very facts that exist there. The Tennessee River is about 2,300 miles long, with its tributaries. The project when completed, except the Mussel Shoals, will cost $6,700,000, and was adopted by Congress some years ago. This bill only carries $550,000 for the Tennessee River.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. If the gentleman will allow me, the Tennessee River last year bore a commerce in excess of $23,000,000.

Mr. MOON. It did; but I do not care to go into a discussion of the merits of the Tennessee River. The National Waterways Commission of the United States has done that, and demonstrated the fact that it is the third or fourth best river in the United States.

Mr. GOULDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. Certainly.

Mr. GOULDEN. I hold no brief for the governor of New York, but, if he was quoted correctly, I feel confident he knew what he was talking about. He was finding no fault with the appropriations named, but was making a comparison where expenditures had already been made in the sections named with the Hudson River, and I think in that he was justified. That great historic river has certainly not received its just share at the hands of Congress.

Mr. MOON. He was not justified in making the statement that he did in regard to the Tennessee River, for certainly it is not true.

Mr. DRISCOLL. If the gentleman from Tennessee will pardon me, the statement that you get from the governor's speech is only a comparison as to the total amount of commerce and tonnage in comparison with that of the Hudson River.

Mr. MOON. That may be. The gentleman from Texas read the objectionable statement.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Here is the vital defect in the criticism of the governor: He took the total appropriations made for the river since time began and compared it with the tonnage floating on the river in one year. Of course, that is utterly—I will not say absurd, because it is the governor of New York, but it is an unjust criticism.

Mr. MOON. It is evident, too, that the governor did not know just what he was talking about when he spoke about a large expenditure by the Government just below Chattanooga. There has been no large Government expenditure there. The expenditure that the governor refers to was perhaps at Muscle Shoals, a project separate from the other improvements, and which will be taken up later. His statement could not be reconciled in any other way.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. I will.

Mr. CALLAWAY. This governor was speaking before the National River and Harbor Congress, evidently on invitation, and they published this speech and have put it out, and this is the statement that he made:

In the shoal canals of the Tennessee River near Chattanooga the United States Government made an expenditure for improvements representing a cost of $11.91 for every ton of freight carried through the canal.

When? For all time.

Mr. MOON. The truth about it is there is no canal just below Chattanooga at all.

Mr. CALLAWAY. That would represent every ton of freight moving up and down the river which has to go through the shoals. If it cost $11.91 for every ton of freight, that is more than the freight on every ton of stuff that moves up and down the river is worth.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. MOON. I ask unanimous consent for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOON. Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Texas is mistaken. These rivers are to be considered as a whole, and the tonnage carried as a whole, in making the calculation. It is absurd to think for a moment that that statement can be true when applied to the full length of the Tennessee River, the improved part of it, the navigable part, during nine months of the year. He evidently had in mind—and there would be no sense or consistency in the statement otherwise—possibly that part of the tonnage that was carried through what is known as Muscle Shoals. And he would then be in error. He knows very little about it when he speaks of it as that part of the river near Chattanooga. It is 150 miles from Chattanooga. The Government has a canal there and is operating it, and has been for years, and has to continue it or make locks and dams there if the river is kept open. It is very clear that the governor's whole remarks refer to that short passage through the river known as Muscle Shoals, else are thoroughly erroneous. The report of the Waterways Commission contradicts all of these statements here when it is proposed to be applied to the river as a whole.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Matawan Creek, N. J.: Completing improvement in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 43, Sixty-third Congress, first session, $72,000.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I have found some difficulty in ascertaining the facts in regard to matters contained in the bill. I suppose we will all be criticized, those of us who ask for information, because we are unable to inform ourselves as well as members of the committee. I sent for different reports, after I had read the bill the day before it came on for a hearing, and was unable to secure but a limited number. Some of the reports I have read, and they do not warrant the appropriations, in my judgment, and I am compelled to oppose them. It is not the engineer's judgment of commercial desirability that is going to govern me. It is the importance of the improvement and the necessity of the improvement. That being so, I wish to know in this case what is the character of the improvement proposed in this project?

Mr. SPARKMAN. What project is that?

Mr. FREAR. The improvement of Mattawan Creek, N. J., on page 10, third line of the bill.

Mr. SCULLY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Certainly.

Mr. SCULLY. It is to secure a channel depth of 8 feet.

Mr. FREAR. What is the necessity for it?

Mr. SCULLY. To increase commerce.

Mr. FREAR. Who is to be served?

Mr. SCULLY. The people in that community.

Mr. FREAR. Who are they, and how many?

Mr. SCULLY. There are hundreds of thousands of dollars commerce on that creek, probably two or three hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Nearly five hundred thousand.

Mr. FREAR. What kind of commerce is it?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I fancy the gentleman from New Jersey, Mr. Scully, can explain that better than I.

Mr. SCULLY. It is brick, top soil, fertilizer, and there is a very important passenger traffic on the river, and the improvement will very materially reduce the freight rates.

Mr. FREAR. For whom?

Mr. SCULLY. For the people of the State of New Jersey.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I have here the report, in which I have been interested. It is House Document No. 43, the first I was able to secure when I sent over for them, and, reading from page 3, I find the following:

From the information now available it appears that the cost of the project proposed is not unreasonable when compared with the probable benefits to general commerce and navigation that may be expected to result.

The amount proposed to be expended here is $72,000. How much has been expended there already?

Mr. SCULLY. I think about $65,000.

Mr. FREAR. Sixty-five thousand six hundred and forty-seven dollars.

Mr. SCULLY. Yes.

Mr. FREAR. I also now state the character of freight that is carried on that creek at the present time which it is proposed to improve with Government money. There is a brick establishment there that ships about 12,000 tons, and a shipment of coal to run the factories amounts to about 14,000 tons.

Mr. SCULLY. From what page is the gentleman reading?

Mr. FREAR. Page 5 of the statement offered by the engineer. Top soil, 30,000 tons; lumber, with which to build the houses, 206,000 feet; fertilizer, 5,000 tons. Miscellaneous and all other is 469 tons, and there is not a single item of merchandise. Six hundred and eighty-seven tons are shipped outside of that already mentioned. So far as I can understand, the people of these three or four factories want an 8-foot channel. That is the only thing that will serve their purpose, as shown on page 5. Reading on page 6, I find:

On Matawan Creek there is one public dock, owned by the municipality, located about 700 feet east of the New York & Long Branch Railroad Co. This dock is open to all on equal terms, but is in bad repair and practically inaccessible, owing to the shallowness of the water, and is practically unused.

That is the kind of harbor it is proposed to appropriate $72,000 for, after having already expended $65,000, in order to serve, as the report apparently indicates, several manufacturers or people who have fertilizer establishments. I ask if that is correct?

Mr. SCULLY. That is correct.

Mr. FREAR. If that be so, then I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 10, strike out all of lines 3, 4, 5, and 6.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that is one of the purposes for which the Government should make contributions. We have been asked to accept the report of the engineer. The report of the engineer is practically to determine the engineering possibility, the value of the project from an engineering standpoint; but his judgment is no better than that of any Member of this House in determining its value to the public at large. We have been told here on the floor, and it is admitted by the gentleman who presumably introduced this proposition into the bill, that it is to serve several manufacturers up in that creek. I have shown the character of shipments, that not one dollar's worth of merchandise is shipped, but simply the products of factories, and the committee now ask the Government to come in and put in a channel 8 feet in depth, after having already expended $65,000 there for that very purpose. They now ask for $72,000 more to benefit those few factories. It occurs to me, and I have only given a cursory examination to this project, for I accept the statement of the gentleman as true—it occurs to me that the proposition is not fair for the Government to undertake, namely, to dig a channel up there to three or four factories to help them secure better water facilities for their factories.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Chairman, what were the figures the gentleman gave about fertilizers and top soil?

Mr. FREAR. I will be very glad to read them again.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I will not ask the gentleman to do that. It is a considerable amount of fertilizer and top soil, and that, of course, is for the use of the farmers adjacent to that territory.

Mr. FREAR. I have here the amount of top soil. It is 30,000 tons out of a total of 80,000 tons, and fertilizer about 5,000 tons.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The gentleman will not maintain that this service is all for the benefit of the factories?

Mr. FREAR. Undoubtedly, from my viewpoint.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Why is it not for the benefit of the farmers who can be served in that way cheaply?

Mr. FREAR. If that be true, if that be the policy of the Government, then, in case a man agrees to put up a factory a hundred miles up a river, we ought to dig a trench to him in order that he may more easily ship his fertilizer at better rates and run larger boats than he could without such Government aid. This appropriation is for several private interests.

Mr. DRISCOLL. If there are now located on this river several manufacturing plants that are prosperous concerns——

Mr. FREAR. I do not know that, and neither does the gentleman.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I assume they are.

Mr. SCULLY. And the gentleman is right about that.

Mr. DRISCOLL. If they were not they would not remain there.

Mr. FREAR. I submitted to a question and not an argument.

Mr. DRISCOLL. My argument is this——

Mr. FREAR. I do not want an argument. I just want the question. What is the gentleman's question?

Mr. DRISCOLL. In all probability several manufacturing establishments would eventually engage in manufacturing upon that river.

Mr. FREAR. That is the question. All right, I will endeavor to answer it. There is no evidence here from the engineers or anybody else that that is likely to occur. The gentleman suggests that these people are all in a prosperous condition. If they are, they ought to be willing to spend their own money for their own interests. They ought to go ahead at their own expense and dredge that place for their own benefit. That is what seems to be objectionable here, that the Government has got to help two or three private parties out, not for the benefit of the public at large, but for the benefit of those parties. You can get fertilizer anywhere else just as easily as at these institutions——

Mr. HELM. What is the length of this river?

Mr. FREAR. I think this creek is——

Mr. SCULLY. About 2 miles.

Mr. FREAR. Why, think of it, for 2 miles the Government has spent all this money to help four or five fertilizer factories.

Mr. HELM. Would it not be cheaper to build a railroad?

Mr. FREAR. Yes; as the gentleman suggests here, I think it would, and I will accept that as an amendment to the amendment which I have offered.

Mr. SCULLY. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that the Federal Government has spent several million dollars on a creek 4 miles long, with a commerce of $7,000,000?

Mr. FREAR. That is not the question.

Mr. SCULLY. It is the commerce we are appropriating money for, and the length of the creek does not enter into the consideration.

Mr. FREAR. I will answer it if the gentleman will permit me. That is true, but you have shown no such commerce there; you have shown the cheapest grade of commerce——

Mr. SCULLY rose.

Mr. FREAR. I will not yield at this time—you have shown by the report the cheapest grade of commerce. You have not got anything that approaches a product that calls for support from the Government. You have New York Harbor only 20 miles away and there are few people who would object to great appropriations to aid navigation there because of the enormous extent of its commerce. And I want to say, Mr. Chairman, before I take my seat, in regard to this proposition, I will answer the gentleman, I understand——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FREAR. I understand that this is not a popular move, that every State practically stands behind the proposition in which it is interested. That is true on this floor, and we all know it; and the moment you raise your voice here in opposition to anything, the delegates from the State interested are always brought to its support. I believe it is not proper to inquire into these various projects, although it would not be encouraging to the rest of the committee to see one dropped, but it seems to me we ought to exercise common sense and judgment under the oaths we have taken and vote out a proposition in which only three or four private parties are interested. You would not help anything else. You would not subsidize anyone else. You might as well say the Government should build vessels to run there or railroads to the extent of the expenditure of $72,000 on those 2 miles.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Is there any reason to believe that freight rates will be reduced at all? Will the public get that stuff 1 cent cheaper after they get the $140,000 and spend it?

Mr. FREAR. Only inferentially. In fact, the engineers can not tell.

Mr. McCOY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FREAR. I will.

Mr. McCOY. Does the gentleman object to subsidies?

Mr. FREAR. In nearly every case I object to a subsidy.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman has read the report of the engineers correctly or has given the correct interpretation to it, I think his contention is right and that the amendment he offers ought to be adopted if the policy of the committee of following the recommendations of the engineers is to be consistent. Mr. Chairman, I represent a harbor district and have had experience with the engineers and with committees of Congress. I have asked appropriations for continuance and for maintenance of harbors in my district, and have been told by the engineer, and later by the committee, in some instances, that the benefits to accrue from the expenditure of public money, although very large, are entirely local in their nature; that the property located at a harbor and in the vicinity will be greatly improved, business will be benefited, but, in the opinion of the engineer and of the committee, it is a matter of local benefit, in which the Government of the United States and the people of the country are not interested; and that Federal appropriations are to be refused unless the benefit is to be general, unless the business to be carried on there is interstate in its character. Here is a proposition to improve a little river for the benefit exclusively of the factories located on it, for the purpose of securing more factories, for the purpose of improving business, increasing the value of local property, and providing more employment for the people of the particular locality. If the engineers have made a correct report, or if I understand the statement made by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR], this appropriation is being made entirely for the advantage of local interests and for local benefits, then these engineers are inconsistent, or, rather, they differ from engineers working in some other parts of the country; the committee is inconsistent in recommending this appropriation, and the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] ought to prevail.

Mr. SLOAN, Mr. MOORE, and Mr. SPARKMAN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN] is recognized.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I hope this amendment will not prevail. To me the criticisms of this item are very unjust and do not fully state the conditions. In fact, if it is true—and that I dispute—that there are only three or four factories there to be benefited by the improvement, it would not justify the striking out of this item nor lessen any the importance of the work. Reading the report of the engineers I find that some of the items making up the commerce are fire brick, coal, top soil, lumber, sand, and fertilizer. The fertilizer to which my friend refers there amounts to only 5,000 tons—I suppose it means tons—a very small part of the total commerce of the stream. But, as I have said, if it were true that only a few factories are to be benefited, it would not lessen the importance of the work, for while perhaps they are being conducted by private parties, the products of those factories will be used away from there and will and do enter into the commerce of the whole country.

Mr. FREAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Certainly.

Mr. FREAR. Is it not a fact that there are two railroads running within a mile of where this product is manufactured?

Mr. SPARKMAN. That may be true, but let me read to you what the engineer says bearing upon the situation:

The effect of this improvement—

Says the Chief of Engineers in his report—meaning the improvement already made affording 4 feet of water where we are trying to give 8 feet—

The effect of this improvement has been to greatly reduce rates of freight, especially in the marketing season. Recent appropriations have been insufficient to maintain the channel in the upper part of the creek, where the market boats load. Consequently that branch of the commerce has been abandoned.

Mr. FREAR. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Certainly.

Mr. FREAR. In case this is an interstate-commerce road, has not the Interstate Commerce Commission sole power to determine whether the rate should be raised? Is there any object in increasing the channel so as to increase the amount of shipment?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes; the Commerce Commission could, no doubt, act.

Mr. FREAR. If you have fixed it as low as you can, what is the use of digging the channel and expending $72,000?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I presume, of course, the improvement has had and will have an effect on the railroad rates along there, but I would not urge that alone, I will say to my friend, as a reason for the improvement of any harbor or stream, because the Interstate Commerce Commission can regulate interstate rates. But we improve our waterways, first, for the benefit of commerce, for the accommodation of freight, to furnish additional facilities for the distribution of the products of the country to the consumer at home and abroad.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I do.

Mr. MOORE. I desire to speak on this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to call attention to the fact that debate on this amendment is closed, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. MOORE. I move to strike out certain words, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent for two minutes additional. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I desire only to add that I think this is a very important provision. The fact that a few factories are along the banks of the stream should not militate against it. There is hardly a waterway improvement anywhere that does not benefit some manufacturing establishments; but they likewise benefit the whole country, for the whole country is interested in our manufacturing establishments.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I will.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Does the gentleman from Florida say that appropriations are made here chiefly for the purpose of aiding and benefiting local manufacturers?

Mr. SPARKMAN. No, sir; I did not say that. The gentleman misunderstood me. On the contrary, the chief purpose of making these improvements is for the benefit of general commerce. All of the products of the factories, the mines, and the farms enter into general commerce, and it is hardly possible to find one the products of which do not enter partly into general commerce, to draw the line between what is purely local and what is general.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I will say that in some of the harbors in my district the engineers draw the line, and they require that the commerce be large and of general interest, and that it be interstate, and no matter how large the profit or advantage to the local interests may be, they deny favorable recommendation.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Florida yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I do.

Mr. CALLAWAY. These people are supplied with railroad facilities, and this water transportation of 4 feet, and they answer every demand in that country, and the only proposition would be that if you give them 8 feet of water instead of 4 it would be cheaper. It is simply a question only of cheapening the rate, is it not?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Oh, no; it would be for the benefit of general commerce. It is largely a question of furnishing additional facilities for the transportation of freight.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, may I proceed for five minutes? I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I was going to ask unanimous consent in that connection, Mr. Chairman, that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN] asks unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE]?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this amendment on general principles. It seems to me to be commendable on the part of a Member of Congress to look out for the welfare of his district as it relates to the welfare of the country, and in this instance the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. SCULLY], if he is responsible for this item for the improvement of Matawan Creek, is simply endeavoring to contribute to the general welfare of the country by contributing to the welfare of his district.

Now, some criticism has been made in regard to the business done on this stream—Matawan Creek. I want to say that this stream connects with Raritan Bay and Raritan Bay connects with the harbor of New York, and that a great volume of the business done in that part of the country is done in the vicinity of Matawan Creek. There is no earthly reason why a Member should be criticized when he wants to look after the welfare of a stream of that kind. The object of this item, evidently, is to improve Matawan Creek into a useful navigable stream. If that can be done, we ought to do it; and it is proper that it should be done through Members of Congress.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] complains of this. I fear, Mr. Chairman—and I say it in the kindliest spirit in the world, because I believe the gentleman's intentions to be wholly correct and pure—that he has not looked very far into the question of the improvement of rivers and harbors, as improvements have heretofore been made, if he bases his objections to the improvement of Matawan Creek merely on the statements he has thus far made.

There is a reason for the improvement of these rivers and harbors, and there is a reason why we ought to be very careful before criticizing a Member of Congress when he looks after the interests of his own particular district. I am not invidious at all, and have no purpose of being sectional when I refer the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] to the item beginning on line 8 of page 41 of this bill——

Improving harbor at Two Rivers, Wis.: For maintenance, $25,000.

That takes us home to the gentleman's own home State, and we may fairly use Two Rivers Harbor, Wis., in a comparative way with Matawan Creek, N. J. Of this Two Rivers Harbor, Wis., the United States Army engineers, in their report for 1913, say:

The original depth of the entrance to Two Rivers was from 3 to 4 feet, and no harbor existed at this place.

Observe: "No harbor existed at this place." I proceed:

Two Rivers is about 5½ miles northerly from Sheboygan and about 50 miles south of Sturgeon Bay Canal.

I will not go further into this now.

Mr. FREAR. Yes. Go ahead. It is quite interesting.

Mr. MOORE. I will go further to this extent, to say that up to this time the engineers report that $247,000 had been expended to make a navigable stream at this point, which had "no harbor" whatever when the first appropriation was made in 1871. Now, notwithstanding the fact that appropriations have been continually made for Two Rivers, Wis., from 1871 down to the present time, the volume of commerce, as reported by the United States engineers, consists mostly of that commerce which is carried upon rowboats and floating logs. The number of vessels using this harbor, as reported by the engineers in 1912, is 56, while the tonnage was only 41,000, of an approximate value of $182,000.

Now, here is a stream that we have appropriated money for to the extent of $247,000 since 1871, and we propose, or the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. SCULLY] proposes, that the Government shall begin work upon a stream in a thriving community, where manufacturers have located and where labor is employed, which already at the beginning has a tonnage of 196,000, or three or four times as much as this other stream in Wisconsin, that has been appropriated for since 1871, and which now has a tonnage of only 41,000, of the value of $182,000.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. MOORE. Yes.

Mr. CALLAWAY. The real object of spending this money on Matawan Creek up here, where the population is congested, is to give employment to labor, is it not?

Mr. MOORE. I will say to the gentleman from Texas that if Matawan Creek does not produce better results in two years' time than this Two Rivers Harbor has produced since the year 1871 I would not vote to continue the appropriation, but if there is a possibility of erecting another factory or enlarging one or employing more labor in a single factory there I would vote for it.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Is the object of these appropriations to spend money on labor?

Mr. MOORE. The spending of money on rivers and harbors gives something for the laborers of this country to think about and work at. We are developing commerce and trade, and we have to improve navigation in order to do it. But the gentleman up to the present time has not been able to see it, because evidently he lives on the sand dunes of interior Texas, if that term applies to the region from which the gentleman comes. He does not seem to know what is going on in the rest of the country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to speak for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto is limited to 10 minutes.

Mr. FREAR. Yes; this is the last five minutes.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Have the 10 minutes been exhausted, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. Not yet. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I am very much interested in the remarks of the gentleman who has just finished. It means if you will let me steal I will steal. That is all that it is. I am going to quote for you some language that expresses this steal about as clearly as anything that could be offered. If you will look upon page 3527 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD you will see it. It occurs to me that it expresses this clearly, and I ask that every gentleman take it to himself in connection with the various propositions in this bill. When the total amount of river and harbor appropriations was $16,285,605 it was stated in this House:

The Mississippi itself has quit having any steamboats on it almost, and the whole scheme of river improvement is a humbug and a steal; but if you are going to steal, let us divide it out, and don't go to complaining.

What will be said when three items in this bill for the improvement of the Mississippi, the Missouri, and the Ohio Rivers amount to more than the entire river and harbor bill of 1901, when it was declared a "humbug" and a "steal"? Thirteen years ago it was declared the Mississippi had quit having any steamboats. What will be said of this bill which in 13 years has grown to $43,289,000?

Mr. MOORE. If the gentleman will pardon me——

Mr. FREAR. I did not interrupt the gentleman and I hope he will not interrupt me.

Mr. MOORE. From whom is the gentleman quoting? Because he started out with the word "steal." The gentleman is not quoting from any remarks of mine, I am sure.

Mr. FREAR. No; this is not a quotation from the gentleman, but it was said in this Capitol and by a gentleman who has been followed for years by many of those in this House.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Who was it?

Mr. FREAR. It was at the other end of the Capitol. Now, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] has always defended these appropriations, as I understand. He says they are for the development of commerce. He asks for $1,000,000 for his own river. Why, Milwaukee has more commerce than Philadelphia to-day.

Mr. MOORE. Oh, the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. FREAR. What is your commerce?

Mr. MOORE. Over 26,000,000 tons per annum.

Mr. FREAR. I will correct that statement as to the total commerce. I was referring to domestic water commerce. But I will say this: That two towns at the upper end of Lake Superior have as much commerce as Philadelphia.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman name those towns?

Mr. FREAR. Yes; Duluth and Superior.

Mr. MOORE. Their tonnage is iron ore, which is the heaviest tonnage that is carried.

Mr. FREAR. Yes; and your tonnage may be fertilizer. If this appropriation ought not to go through, if it is wrong in principle, it is no answer to say to any Member here, "You get an appropriation in your State." I do not ask for any appropriation for my State, and if one is not worthy of being voted for the gentleman ought to attack it on this floor. I ask for no favors in these matters. If it is not right, it ought to be killed, I care not where it be.

Mr. MOORE. Would that apply to Two Rivers, just the same as any other?

Mr. FREAR. That is true; and this is the first time I have known anything about it. I have been unable to get the reports——

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. It was your own fault, then. You could get them.

Mr. FREAR. The gentleman says it was my own fault. The day before yesterday I went to the gentleman from Washington——

Mr. SPARKMAN. If the gentleman did not get the reports, it is his own fault.

Mr. FREAR. I went to the gentleman from Washington and asked him for 15 minutes time out of 9 hours; but he could not give me 15 minutes on the floor. Then I asked for these reports, and was advised no one had asked for a report before. They asked me if I was a member of the committee. I said no. Then they asked why did I want them, and I said because I wanted to know how to vote.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. Did you get the reports?

Mr. FREAR. I did get a limited number, which I have before me. I could not get the others.

Mr. SCULLY. To whom did you apply for the reports?

Mr. FREAR. To the gentleman who issues them.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. Did you go to the committee?

Mr. FREAR. No; I never understood I should go to the committee.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. You did not go to the committee, did you?

Mr. FREAR. No; but after looking at the 7-page report made by the committee, it occurred to me they did not care to give such information excepting through regular channels. I looked at the United States engineers' reports, 5,000 pages in three thick books that you have here, but I could not begin to examine those reports. They are not easily understood, because the information in specific projects is scattered throughout the three volumes.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. CALLAWAY. After going through the discussion that you have gone through, are you not still of the opinion that they do not want you to know anything about it?

Mr. FREAR. I am still of the opinion that, no matter what is here, as the gentleman from Illinois said, no matter what you show, you can not drive anything out of this bill, because those interested in the bill will all stand together.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired. Debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR].

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. FREAR) there were—ayes 12, noes 63.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FREAR. I wish to offer another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 10, line 6, strike out "$72,000" and insert "$36,000" and add the following language: "Providing there shall first be raised by the State, county, or locality an equal amount, which shall be placed in the hands of the Secretary of War toward said improvement before any part of the appropriation shall be expended."

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on this amendment has been closed. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SPARKMAN) there were—ayes 16, noes 58.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I have noticed that several gentlemen in the House, notably the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] who just addressed the committee a moment ago, have indicated that it is impossible to obtain information in regard to these projects; and repeated reference has been made to the fact that the report upon this bill is seven pages long.

Now, the amount of information which is easily available to every Member of Congress is very great, and it is very accessible. Every project that is reported upon is reported upon separately, and the report is transmitted to the Speaker of the House and published as a separate pamphlet. I send for those reports every morning, and receive a copy of every one of them as it comes out. Those are easy to obtain. But that is not all. The Chief of Engineers makes a report, which he puts in one volume, which is, in the main, taken from the reports on the various projects. That is published in one volume, giving information about every proposition that is in the bill and many which are not in the bill. That volume can be obtained without any difficulty. In addition to that—in addition to the direct report of the Chief of Engineers—there are published two volumes more, containing a report of the local engineers upon each one of these projects. So that this information is published for the benefit of Members of Congress three distinct and separate times. Now, I do not blame a new Member of Congress for not having learned about all of the documents that are issued for his information.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. Is it not true that there is a report of the hearings before the committee upon almost everything in the bill?

Mr. MANN. That is not available to Members of Congress. You may have to send to the committee for that. Much of it is the result of documents and maps and is not available.

However, the other information is available, and it is the only kind of information that I know of that is published in three different forms for the benefit of Members of the House.

There is no excuse for saying that it is impossible to obtain the information about these projects. There is an excuse for saying that if you wait until the river and harbor bill is reported to the House you will not be able to digest the information about the thousand or so projects covering a large number of volumes if you include the separates that are first published.

I am glad, however, that these two gentlemen, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY] and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR], are calling attention to some of these items. Of course, I do not think they will carry any amendment. That is not because the bill is made up between gentlemen who propose to support each other, but because it is impossible for the membership of this House to construct a river and harbor bill on the floor of the House. The wisest gentleman in the House who has not specially investigated a particular project will be disposed to follow the recommendations of the committee. You can not expect the majority of the Members of the House to do otherwise. But I say it is a good thing to have some of these projects criticized. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] a moment ago called attention to the Twin River Harbor, and, according to his statement, the item is not defensible, although he will vote for it, as I shall.

It is a good thing to have attention called to these items not so much to influence the action of the House at this time but because it makes the committee more careful in the future. No committee relishes just criticism, and it may be that items creep into the bill inadvertently or without sufficient information in making up a great bill like this, which are subject to criticism. Probably they ought not to have been in the bill, but criticism leveled as these gentlemen are leveling it against these items is a protection to the House in the future without, in my judgment, being a reflection upon the present members of the committee.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I want to say this: Early in my experience—and it has not yet been very long—I was disposed, as others have been, to be extremely critical with matters that appear as items of this character under discussion. I am a member of the minority in this House, and the majority control the committees; but I would not do justice to my own experience if I did not say that in almost every instance that has come to my knowledge regarding these items and regarding the action of the committees in making up the bills I have found on investigation that the committees were careful and fair and just in their final determination of the matter.

And so I have come to be exceedingly careful about a hasty judgment in condemnation of the action of a committee when I do not know all the facts. I am disposed now, unless the evidence is clear and very strong against it, to hold the belief that the committee has acted fairly and justly in reporting an item. I am not one of those who believe that the predominant tendency and characteristic or intention of Members of this House is to deal unfairly and unjustly. I am not led to the belief that Members act from motives of selfishness. I do not believe that they exchange one favor for another. I do not mean to say that mistakes will not occur. I do not mean to say that men will sometimes not be actuated by unjust motives; but I do mean to say that in the vast majority of instances I believe the desire and intention of Members of this House and of the members of committees in reporting bills to the House is to serve the good of the greatest number of the people. So I am not disposed to act hastily in the condemnation of reports of committees or the action of committees that are reported to this House. [Applause.]

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph be closed in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MONTAGUE). The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph close in five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, in response to what has been said by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], it is needless to say that I have no personal interest in a single proposition in this bill, either for or against it. I am simply carrying out what my judgment dictates to be the policy the Government ought to pursue in this case and all cases—either refuse to give aid where private interests alone are to be subserved, as in this case, or to demand from the private interests that they contribute, as this report requires others to do in two specific cases. That seems to be fair; it seems to me a right policy. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] questions whether or not gentlemen ought to accept the report of the committee as it is presented to them. And I say, without imputation upon the members of the committee, either individually or collectively, that I know it is a hard task, and I do not envy them in their position. I know the pressure that is brought to bear upon them—we all do—for every one of these appropriations; yet I do not believe it benefits a single man to try and get an appropriation into this bill.

I was impressed very much with what I have been reading lately—and I admit a lack of information, and I am always glad to receive it from anyone—so I can not refrain from quoting from the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], who has just spoken, whose words are always well chosen and whose ideas are always strong and well considered. He said yesterday:

The biennial river and harbor appropriation bills a few years ago were considered very large if they got up to thirty or forty millions of dollars, even when they carried items for the city of Chicago. Now they are considered very small when they carry an amount of over $40,000,000 a year in the House, which will mean $50,000,000 or more in the law.

Evidently assuming that the amount will be raised elsewhere before it is finally passed into law. Later on he continued:

So that we are spending now, through the aid of those gentlemen, very large sums of money annually. And what for? What good does it do? Everybody knows that the amount of freight carried by water in itself does not justify the river and harbor improvements of the United States.

That is the indictment, true, as I believe, which any member of this committee should answer.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. But he answered it himself.

Mr. FREAR. Yes; and this is the way he answered it:

But what is the best reason for improving the rivers and harbors? The best regulator of freight rates that can be found within or without the law is competition. And the best competition is water competition.

That was once true as a general proposition. But when you have once established your rate by water competition, what is the object of further exercising it when you can not change it? It is for the Interstate Commerce Commission to thereafter regulate, as we all know. The railway can not change it when competition ceases. What further service will be rendered? When we have words of advice like that from Members of long experience on this floor, Members whom we respect very highly, it is well for us to point out what occurs to us to be imperfections in this bill, like the ones I have suggested, and others to which I desire to call attention. I do not intend to filibuster or attempt to consume the time of the committee for the purpose of interfering with its labors here, but I have several amendments which I wish to propose, to bring out the thought that I have briefly attempted to outline here.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The gentleman says the indictment he has just read——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired. All time has expired. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Shoal Harbor and Compton Creek, N. J.: Completing improvement in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 40, Sixty-third Congress, first session, $56,800.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. As one who has devoted some time to the study of waterways in this country, and particularly along the Atlantic section, I desire to welcome our friend the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] into the very interesting and enthusiastic group of waterways men, and I would like to call his attention to the fact, which perhaps he has not quite grasped as yet, that there is a very sincere and earnest purpose behind those who are advocating waterway improvements. It is not wholly a question of appropriation nor of securing some local advantage. It is a question of obtaining a better transportation service for the people of this country. The whole problem received an impetus in 1907, when after years of desultory appropriations for rivers and harbors there occurred a great car shortage in this country. The grain of the farmers of the West and the Northwest was burned because they could not get it to market. At that time the apples of men who had great orchards in New York State actually rotted in the field, because they could not get them to the purchaser. That was a condition that attracted the attention, not only of the railroad men of the country but of all others. In order that the gentleman who are now raising these questions may be better informed as to the condition that has resulted in a demand for increased appropriations for better facilities in transportation, I want to quote a very famous speech by a man whom everybody regards as the greatest railroad manager of this country, Mr. James J. Hill. He spoke here in Washington to the National Rivers and Harbors Congress in 1907. He said:

We must employ our greatest waterway (referring to the Mississippi) as an important part of the transportation system of the country. The railways now are unequal to the demands upon them. The farmer, the merchant, and the manufacturer are feeling loss from uncertainty and delay in their shipments. Unless commerce can have an adequate channel it must decline.

Mr. Chairman, I am not taking up the cause of Mr. James J. Hill, who then advocated a 16-foot project in the Mississippi River, which I do not quite approve, but he had something on his mind at that time which he wanted to have the country know, and that was that the railroads were incompetent to carry the business of the country and that there must be relief in the way of additional transportation; that there must be competition with or relief for the railroads, else business would stagnate and the man upon the farm would have no proper outlet for his products.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Upon what does the gentleman from Pennsylvania base his opinion that a 16-foot waterway in the Mississippi is not feasible?

Mr. MOORE. Well, I felt that the undertaking of the 16-foot project at that time, it being wholly experimental, would probably rob the whole country of appropriations necessary for needed improvements for a properly diversified population and business.

Mr. MADDEN. And yet the gentleman from Pennsylvania will advocate an appropriation for such a stream as Frankford Creek, running through the city of Philadelphia, where there is no water.

Mr. MOORE. There is plenty of water in both the rivers running through Philadelphia, and the Delaware, which——

Mr. MADDEN. Frankford Creek I am talking about.

Mr. MOORE. That is a stream that ought to be improved by the Government. It has been rejected only because it is contended that the city of Philadelphia is rich enough to improve it itself. It does a national business. The rule applied to Frankford Creek does not apply to hundreds of other streams that I might mention if I had the time.

Mr. MADDEN. Has Frankford Creek been insured against fire? [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE. It has frequently been called upon to aid in extinguishing fires. So long as the gentleman brings up the subject, I am reminded that out in his country there was an appropriation some time ago for a river—by the way, it had an Indian name——

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman ought to know that that river——

Mr. MOORE. I now recall—the name of that river is the Calumet. It was a smoking proposition—the Pipe of Peace. But to return to Mr. James J. Hill. His statement would seem to indicate——

Mr. MADDEN. Is not Mr. James J. Hill the owner of a great railroad?

Mr. MOORE. He is the owner of the Great Northern Railroad.

Mr. MADDEN. And he is asking for these improvements at the expense of the Government?

Mr. MOORE. I think he did in this instance; but I am not taking up the case of Mr. Hill. It is the welfare of the farmer——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to this paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 10, strike out all of lines 11 to 14, inclusive, which is the following language:

"Improving Shoal Harbor and Compton Creek, N. J.: Completing improvement in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 40, Sixty-third Congress, first session, $56,800."

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I have not any faith that this amendment will meet with a better fate than the one last offered, and yet it seems to me that it is equally meritorious, and that this proposition ought not to have been considered by the committee—ought not to have been allowed. I will admit that the committee itself has access to more information, and I will admit further that its judgment ought to be excellent in a case like this, and yet, as I have stated before, I know the pressure that is brought to bear upon every Member, and I further know that it is not only within the committee, but it comes from the outside as well. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], in discussing the proposition just a moment ago, stated that we ought to be liberal with our water appropriations. I ask him if, when the appropriations of this Government have been increased from $16,000,000 a year in 1901 to $43,000,000 this year under the new administration, we are not becoming excessively liberal? There is no politics in this with me. I do not care to take advantage of anything of that kind. But I ask you gentlemen if you are not becoming pretty liberal, and if you are prepared to go to the people with the professions of economy that you have offered in the past, with an appropriation which has increased nearly 300 per cent within 13 years?

Mr. SCULLY. The gentleman says the project has no merit.

Mr. FREAR. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I said it had no more merit than the one we just discussed.

Mr. SCULLY. The gentleman does not mean to convey the idea that a stream having a commerce of a value of over $600,000 is not worthy of improvement?

Mr. FREAR. I will tell this committee, if the gentleman will permit, just what this commerce is. You have 55,000 tons of clams, which can be taken in any kind of a boat. We have appropriated and spent in past years $48,000 for this stream——

Mr. SCULLY. That is right.

Mr. FREAR. And there is proposed here an appropriation of $56,800 more for 55,000 tons of clams shipped last year. That is all you have outside of 3,000 tons of coal and 800 tons of fertilizer.

Mr. SCULLY. Oh, we ship coal, brick——

Mr. FREAR. Oh, surely, you have shown 600 tons of brick, but we are asked to build a proposition of this kind for $56,000. The Government ought not to help you to ship 600 tons of brick. You can put those on a flatboat and float them down at any time. That is the amount of commerce at this point.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. I can not yield further now—I will yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. SLOAN. I desire to ask the gentleman if he is not a little unhappy in selecting his point of opposition in the State of New Jersey, which seems so well able to take care of itself, as in the tariff bill it kept 80 per cent of its products upon the protected list, while Nebraska and some of the rest of the States were allowed only 35 per cent. I doubt not it will be equally well taken care of in this bill, and why not transfer the gentleman's attack to a more vulnerable State? Greatness takes care of its own.

Mr. FREAR. I appreciate the force of the gentleman's statement, but I have been trying to confine myself to the economic view entirely and leave the other for those better qualified to consider it.

On page 3 of the report it says that passenger excursion steamers run to this port during the summer season, and that the reason the appropriation is desired is for the passenger traffic. If a summer excursion be a necessary traffic, I concede the Government ought to look after this project. If the Government ought to put in a channel for such traffic, I concede this is one of the propositions that deserves support; but I do not believe navigation for the general public interest contemplates that we should reach out for such projects unless we increase the field of operations very materially. The report says:

> A line of passenger and excursion steamers runs to this port during the summer season, and requires a sufficient depth to permit a regular schedule to be followed, without regard to the stage of tide.

That is the reason—they want those passenger steamers, and that is why they need a deep harbor.

This new fertilizer industry is located upon Compton Creek.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto end in five minutes.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, make it 10; I object to 5.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I hope the gentleman from Florida can make it 10 minutes.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I want to offer one more amendment.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. If the gentleman from Wisconsin objects, I will object to his proceeding.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto be closed in 10 minutes.

Mr. FREAR. This is the only way I have been able to get any time.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. You are getting along very well now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to close debate in 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I mentioned a moment ago a new fertilizing industry that they have established in the creek. That is the ground and the only ground upon which this appropriation is attempted to be justified; but passenger steamers are what they want. This factory is located on Compton Creek, it is said, and there is to be a large tonnage in and out. They have never handled a ton yet, but they are just establishing themselves, and we have got to build the creek up there to a depth of 8 feet, so as to get a factory while the Government is permitted to carry out the fertilizer. [Laughter.] And this is at a first cost of $48,491.27.

The report further states what this fertilizer company proposes to do, and that the Government should build a river for the fertilizer company. Does it not seem strange that the Government should be asked to engage in an occupation of that kind?

Mr. SCULLY. It is to improve the river.

Mr. FREAR. Certainly. That is the reason why the Government should build this 2 feet more for $50,000. That is all I have to say on that.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. ALEXANDER). The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. FREAR. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 8, noes 56.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer another amendment to this same paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Page 10, line 6, after the word "session," strike out "$56,800" and insert "$28,000: Provided, That there shall first be raised by the State, county, or locality an equal amount, which will be placed in the hands of the Secretary of War toward said improvement before any part of this appropriation shall be expended."

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, this is practically the provision that the committee itself has inserted in two other places, requiring two other communities to make such contribution; that is it is substantially so in effect if not in form. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I am not through. I have five minutes in which to talk, as long as I have the floor. I thought the gentleman from Florida rose, and I supposed he was going to interrupt.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin will proceed.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I care not to offer any other amendment of this character. We have a number of these propositions proposing the same kind of improvements, or proposed improvements, largely for the benefit of some little special interest up some creek. I have examined a score of reports where substantially similar conditions exist. I would like to offer amendments to them, but do not care to do so, except just to bring to the attention of the committee the character of the projects the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] so well suggested awhile ago, appropriations that we are making and money we are spending, without asking a dollar in return excepting from some little fishing village which is to have a $6,000 appropriation, providing it contribute $3,000 toward it.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. With pleasure.

Mr. MURDOCK. What does the gentleman propose to do with this amendment?

Mr. FREAR. To require this fertilizer company to pay one-half of the cost of this dredging.

Mr. MURDOCK. That is, this improvement will be largely for the benefit of this fertilizer company?

Mr. FREAR. Practically entirely so, as the other cases show.

Mr. MOORE. Does the gentleman know of any other instance of this kind in the country where the condition is made that a private concern shall donate money for the dredging of a navigable stream?

Mr. FREAR. In just a moment.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I can tell the gentleman of a number of reports made by the engineers on projects where they recommend a Government appropriation only on condition that the local interests contribute a stated amount.

Mr. MOORE. Can the gentleman name one of them?

Mr. FREAR. Pardon me; I will name one right here in the report. I had it here yesterday. It appears twice in the report. Here is Northeast, Black, and Cape Fear Rivers. That locality or other interests are required to contribute one-half after the cost of construction. That is expressed in the report in plain English. It is a good provision. You will find it on page 19. If you put that into this and similar projects, I do not think there will be much objection.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from New Jersey?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The gentleman has stated, in answer to the question of the gentleman from Kansas, that this was practically all in the interest of a fertilizer company?

Mr. FREAR. Largely so.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The gentleman wants to be fair I know. The total amount of commerce is $612,000, of which $24,000 only is for this fertilizer factory.

Mr. FREAR. If the gentleman will pardon me, they are establishing a new fertilizing company, and that is given in the engineers' report for the complete channel as a reason for the project.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a moment?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Is it not the purpose in creating navigable facilities to give an opportunity for the establishment of new enterprises along the waterway in order that the quantity of freight may be increased from time to time?

Mr. FREAR. If the gentleman wants an answer, I will say that if he will read that report it carries unmistakable evidence in every line that it is for the benefit of the "summer residenters" there.

Mr. MADDEN. Would the gentleman object to the establishment of new enterprises along an established waterway?

Mr. FREAR. There are items in this bill, Mr. Chairman, in which they have gone off a hundred miles from navigation for the purpose of bringing products to market. The gentleman from Florida has an instance of that, which was called to my attention yesterday, and there are others.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, what did the gentleman say the gentleman from Florida had?

Mr. FREAR. I said the gentleman from Florida had an instance of an appropriation of which he spoke yesterday, an appropriation of over $700,000, I believe, to bring products a distance of 100 miles—oranges, for instance, and things like that, down a small stream to the St. Johns River.

Mr. SPARKMAN. The gentleman refers to Ocklawaha River.

Mr. FREAR. I did not know before yesterday that it was in the gentleman's district.

Mr. SPARKMAN. The gentleman has about stated the fact.

Mr. FREAR. I desire to be correct. I am trying to state only facts.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired. All time has expired on this amendment. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Shoal Harbor and Compton Creek, N. J.: Completing improvement in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 40, Sixty-third Congress, first session, $56,800.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. STAFFORD. My purpose in rising is to direct the attention of the committee to the different policies pursued by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors in regard to dredging and maintaining streams entirely within a State if they happen to be on the Atlantic seaboard, or on the Pacific seaboard, or, I assume, in the Gulf States, and the policy that they pursue toward these streams when they happen to be upon the Great Lakes.

I recall distinctly my first appearance before this committee, some 10 or 12 years ago, in advocacy of a proposition pertaining to the improvement of the inner harbor at Milwaukee, a port that has a tonnage greater than that of the port of Chicago—more than 8,000,000 net registered tons. The distinguished chairman of that committee, now the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], stated in the hearing that it was the uniform rule for the committee never to make any appropriation whatsoever for the improvement, either in dredging or in maintaining, beyond the outer harbor line. Yesterday I was quite surprised when I found in this bill a provision carrying an appropriation of $25,000 for continuing the dredging of the Connecticut River, a stream entirely within a State; that that rule was being applied to that river; and on further investigation I find that that is the policy applied to all rivers on the Atlantic coast.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman is choosing an unfortunate instance.

Mr. STAFFORD. I will cite another, that of Coopers River, with which I am personally acquainted, and I know that the gentleman from Philadelphia is also personally acquainted with it, because it is right opposite his district.

Mr. MOORE. Do I understand that the gentleman's argument is that the Government should not make appropriations for a stream wholly within the boundaries of a State?

Mr. STAFFORD. I claim that there should be equal treatment given to these localities on the Great Lakes with localities in other parts of the country, and that there should not be any discrimination as against the harbors located on the Great Lakes as compared with those tributary to the tidewater rivers.

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman is opposed to an appropriation for streams within a State?

Mr. STAFFORD. I would have many qualms about an appropriation for Coopers Creek. It has now reached the dignity of a river. But the name by which it is known in Camden and in Philadelphia is "Coopers Creek." It is nothing but a little jerk-water stream. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE. There is as much business on Coopers Creek as there is on several rivers in Wisconsin for which appropriations are made and to which the gentleman does not object at all.

Mr. STAFFORD. So far as the streams of Wisconsin are concerned, we have not received any appropriation for improvement beyond the outer harbor lines. What do we find on Coopers Creek and other creeks emptying into the Delaware River, of which the gentleman has knowledge, and of which I have knowledge? What is it but a little tidewater stream, where there is no business at all, except perhaps a few private establishments, a chemical works, and a bridge works? I want to know what is the rule that the committee follows in giving one kind of treatment to streams on the Atlantic coast and another kind of treatment to harbors and rivers on the Great Lakes?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I wanted to remind the gentleman, when he says there is no commerce on that stream, that the value of the commerce on that stream was $4,224,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. I did not make the statement that there was no commerce on the stream. A gentleman of the committee yesterday was surprised that the committee of which he has been so long a member had not made any appropriations for dredging and maintenance of streams beyond the harbor lines of many streams of Wisconsin, and I challenge him now, after his 12 years of service on this committee, to show where his committee has expended any money appropriated for dredging on the interior waterways of Wisconsin.

I make this inquiry in all good faith. I should like to know from the chairman of the committee or some other member, if the committee feels warranted in this policy of appropriating money for dredging and for maintaining these little streams that lead up from navigable tidewaters on the Atlantic coast, why should not the committee adopt an equal policy toward the rivers and streams that empty into the Great Lakes?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I am glad to answer that question. In days gone by there was some such rule as the gentleman mentions, so far as the Great Lakes were concerned. This rule, however, did not receive the approval of the entire committee, and I do not think is now being applied anywhere outside of the Lakes and not to all the harbors there.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes longer, so as to give the chairman of the committee an opportunity to reply to this query.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I should like to see the same rule applied to all sections of the country and to all rivers and all harbors; that is, to improve them for the benefit of commerce and in accordance with its demands, whether the improvements are located on the Lakes or elsewhere, and, whatever may have been done in the past, I think that will be the policy of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors in the future. I am not now offering any criticism of the old policy, if policy it was, and, as I said, it was never universally applied; and in the future, as in the recent past, I think the committee will be disposed to consider every project, whether on the Lakes or elsewhere, in the light of the commerce benefited. This seems to me to be the wise policy. If localities or individuals are to be especially benefited, they may be required to participate, or the work may be left to them, as circumstances may suggest. But I think no hard and fast rule should be laid down.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the municipality of Milwaukee has been expending from its own treasury hundreds of thousands of dollars annually in the maintenance of its inner waterways, which, as anyone knows, who is acquainted with the traffic on the Great Lakes, carry a commerce amounting to millions and millions of tons annually. I will certainly take advantage of the generous statement of the chairman of the committee as to its future policy, and will come before his committee next year asking for a liberal appropriation of a sufficient amount to maintain our interior harbors along the same lines that they have been maintained in years gone by by the municipality itself.

Mr. SCULLY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman refers to Coopers Creek as a jerkwater creek. I want to ask the gentleman if he thinks that is a fair name for a stream having 350,000 tons of commerce, valued at $4,224,000?

Mr. STAFFORD. Any person who knows Coopers Creek knows that it is just off Coopers Point. I will make the personal reference that before the war my father had a blacksmith shop on the banks of that stream, and I know something about it. I also know something about Woodburys Creek and some others. The gentleman called it a river. It is known as a creek in Camden and Philadelphia.

Mr. SCULLY. Evidently the gentleman knows nothing about the commerce on the creek.

Mr. STAFFORD. The commerce consists of the Browning Chemical Works, the Camden Iron Works, and a few other private establishments, and the industrious Member from that district has been alert enough to get an appropriation to accommodate these private establishments, which, I assume, had the benefit of other means of transportation, and has got the National Government to aid with water transportation there. Of course, you can find innumerable instances along the Jersey shore of the Delaware River where you can excavate channels to reach private plants, and of course those private establishments are only too willing to have this expense borne by the National Government. But how can you justify that policy if you are not going to carry it to the other logical extreme of building private railroads to those plants?

There must be some existing navigation there before the National Government adopts the policy of going into the expenditure of these great amounts of money for the direct benefit of some private establishments.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington, Mr. MADDEN, Mr. MOORE, and Mr. McLAUGHLIN rose.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I will ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph close in five minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. I am going to object to that. I want to be heard on this question.

Mr. MOORE. I should like time on this.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I should like five minutes.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I withdraw the request, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], who just took his seat, seems to be laboring under a great delusion. I do not know where he got the idea that we do not improve a river because it is wholly within a State. The Government has just as much control over a river inside of a State as it has over one that flows through several States, so far as navigation is concerned, provided the navigation of that river is connected with outside navigation—with the ocean. The gentleman said he wished that I would point out some river in this bill in Wisconsin, and I take great delight in doing so. First, I want to call the attention of the gentleman to this river, Cooper Creek, he has been criticizing, which he calls a creek. The fact has already been called to his attention that there is over $4,000,000 worth of commerce upon that stream.

Now let us go over to Wisconsin, where these great patriots come from who are making so much protest here upon the floor of the House, because, forsooth, there are a few appropriations for some of these creeks. Let us look at Wisconsin for a minute. I find that in Wisconsin we have appropriated $25,000 for the improvement of Fox River, and that there has been a total appropriation for that stream of $3,901,906. How much commerce do you suppose we have developed on that magnificent Wisconsin stream with an expenditure of $3,900,000? The value of the commerce on that stream last year was $634,632, and it amounted to 145,000 tons upon that magnificent Wisconsin river. No wonder these patriotic gentlemen are making so much disturbance about the appropriations that go into streams in other States. My suggestion to these gentlemen would be that they at least look at their own projects before they criticize others. Perhaps the committee made a mistake in making the appropriation for Fox River. Certainly, if there are any mistakes in this bill, this one in regard to Fox River, Wis., is one. [Applause.]

Mr. McCOY. I would like to ask the gentleman what figures he gave for the Fox River.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. We have made a total appropriation of $3,900,000.

Mr. McCOY. Is it not a fact that the rivers and harbors of New Jersey, since the foundation of the Government, have received altogether only $4,700,000?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I do not know.

Mr. McCOY. That is a fact.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I will yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. FREAR. I want to state to the gentleman that while I have no interest in the appropriations for this State, this Fox River is one of the greatest rivers and carried the greatest traffic because it carried the canal transportation.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Certainly it is a great river; it is up in Wisconsin, and it had to be. In reply to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] in regard to the statement he made in reference to the treatment accorded the harbors on the Great Lakes, the gentleman, as usual when he talks about rivers and harbors, is mistaken. The harbors on the Great Lakes receive exactly the same treatment that the harbors of any other portions of the country receive. So far as I know, the committee has never violated the rule in regard to improving inner harbors.

I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that where the harbor is controlled by the municipality it is entirely different from improving a stream which flows through a State. I am at a loss to understand how the gentleman, so accurate in information as he usually is, has made such a blunder. The rivers in his State have been treated the same as they have in every other State.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I can not agree to the statement made by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] as to the policy of the Rivers and Harbors Committee with respect to the improvement of interior harbors. What the policy of the former chairman of the committee may have been I do not undertake to say, but I do know that before he became chairman of the committee at all the great city from which I come had appropriated for the improvement of its interior harbor, on the recommendation of the Rivers and Harbors Committee, $700,000. That money was expended for the improvement of that river. Previous to the appropriation to which I have referred the navigable depth of the harbors of the lakes was 16 feet. A project was adopted which changed the navigable depth from 16 to 21 feet. The city of Chicago expended on widening the Chicago River about $10,000,000 out of its own treasury. We thought it only fair to ask the Government of the United States to cooperate with the city whose people had expended that vast sum of money to deepen the river to the depth of the project approved by the engineers, and so the Congress in its wisdom, after considering all the facts, deemed it proper to recommend and appropriate $700,000 to be expended on this interior harbor, and that amount of money has been expended. While it has been expended the taxpayers of our community have expended millions of dollars in addition for the improvement of the harbor.

We have widened the river at our own expense from 150 to 250 and in some places 300 feet in width. We have maintained, not a depth of 21 feet, as fixed for the navigable depth of the harbors of the Lakes, but have maintained a depth of 26 feet, a depth sufficient to accommodate the greatest ships which sail the Lakes.

It has not been my experience with the River and Harbor Committee that they have discriminated against cities like Chicago and Milwaukee and other cities on the Lakes. On the contrary, it has been my experience that they have been quite as fair with the cities on the Lakes and the harbors on the Lakes as they have been with the cities and harbors anywhere else in the country. [Applause.]

We are not asking as much money in our section of the country as they are in the East and other sections, and we have more disposition in the Central West and in the cities on the Lakes to help ourselves than they have in some other sections of the country. I say we do not come to the Rivers and Harbors Committee and ask for every dollar we require for the improvement of the navigation of the Lakes.

I want to say here on behalf of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors that there is no committee in this House more fair, more patriotic, more painstaking, or hard working than this committee. [Applause.] It has no intention whatever of discriminating for or against any section of the country. Its members are guided in a large measure by the recommendations of the Engineer Board and the Secretary of War. I have been reluctant to believe that they ought to be guided to the extent they are by the recommendations of the several boards of engineers and the Secretary of War. My own judgment is that this committee ought to exercise more of its own judgment than it does. It is almost impossible to get a project recommended by this committee, even after the Secretary of War has approved of it, and it is quite certain that no project has ever been approved by the committee and recommended to the House until it has had the recommendation and approval of every engineer and every board that had any jurisdiction over the question. I commend the action of the River and Harbor Committee not only to the House but to the country itself as the most patriotic body of men that it has been my privilege to know. [Applause.]

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

I agree with much that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] has said. I have no serious criticism of the bill presented by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. I did, however, take exception to one item of the bill which seemed to me to be based upon evidence which did not justify an appropriation, and the making of the appropriation seemed to me to be along a different line from that followed in making appropriations on the Great Lakes. It seems to me there is evidence of different policies pursued by the engineers in making their investigations of harbors and in making their reports. There is also evidence of different and conflicting policies pursued by the committee itself in looking over these reports and in making recommendations for appropriations in this bill. It seems to me it has been shown clearly enough this afternoon that if a manufacturing concern, located upon a creek or river in the eastern part of the country, is doing a considerable business and wishes an outlet by water for its own advantage, to enable it better to carry on its business at a profit, it is encouraged in coming to this Government and asking for an appropriation for the improvement of the navigation of that creek or river.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I would rather not yield now. My time is very limited. It seems to me that some engineers look at engineering problems and business conditions in that way and recommend appropriations in pursuance of that policy, and in some instances the Committee on Rivers and Harbors has yielded to demands for such appropriations and have approved the policy and are making appropriations along that line. I will say to the gentleman that that policy is not followed on the Great Lakes, or at least my experience is different from that. I have not been able to do business with an engineer along any such line as that. I have not found an engineer doing business in my district—and I have 200 miles of Lake front and about a dozen harbors—who will listen to an argument or appeal in behalf of local interests or give any consideration to local benefits. He never will permit a favorable recommendation of a Government appropriation if it is for the benefit of a manufacturer, to enable him better to reach deep water. He makes a recommendation only in case the business to be served and the commerce to be carried is interstate in its character.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Yes.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. The gentleman complains, I understand it, about conditions in Michigan. Is it not a fact that Michigan leads all the States in the amounts of appropriations, with a total of $43,494,495?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Perhaps it is true that Michigan has led all the States in the matter of harbor appropriations, but included in that large amount of $43,000,000 expended in Michigan are appropriations for improvement of the locks at the Soo, and they are more than half of that amount. Gentlemen complain of the money expended in the State of Michigan. Evidently the gentleman does not appreciate the commerce that is carried on through the locks at the Soo and passing through the Detroit River, which is the greatest waterway in the world, nor does he appreciate the business transacted at the numerous harbors along the shores of Michigan and of other points of the Great Lakes. I have some figures here, Mr. Chairman, which I think will be interesting to the House. We have heard a great deal about the Panama Canal and the amount of business which we anticipate will be transacted there and in regard to business transacted at the Suez Canal. I wish to give some figures showing the relative importance of the Suez Canal, the estimated business of the Panama Canal, and of the canal at the Soo. According to the best estimates we have the business of the Panama Canal in 1915 will amount to 10,500,000 tons.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in seven minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan is recognized for two minutes more.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, the estimated business for the Panama Canal is 10,500,000 tons. The business last year at the Suez Canal was 20,275,000 tons. The business which last year went through the canal at the Soo—the St. Marys River Canal—was 57,989,715 tons, or nearly double the amount of business which went through the Suez Canal and the estimated amount to go through the Panama Canal in 1915. I did not wish to be led into a discussion of the amount of money that has been expended. I stated that I had no criticism to make of the work of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and I have had no serious complaint to make of the work of the engineers in my district. My criticism is that there seems to be a different policy pursued, a different idea in mind when the engineers are at work on the Great Lakes and when they are carrying on their work on these creeks and rivers and little dinky streams which empty into the ocean.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I wish the gentleman would explain the difference, because, as a member of the committee, I would like to know if there has been a different policy pursued.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, I will tell the gentleman that in behalf of the city of Manistee, in my district, I asked for a considerable appropriation to improve the harbor. The engineer demanded that we show him commerce there in which the rest of the country is interested. He insisted that the local interests or benefits to local business were not to be considered at all. We were fortunately able to show him that the city of Manistee produces more salt than any other point in the United States, and that the question of freight is very important and influences the price of salt to the ultimate consumers in the entire northwestern country. That was the policy pursued by the engineers in that case, and the same policy is pursued and the same idea prevails when other harbor projects are investigated. That was the kind of showing demanded of us when we were asking an improvement of one of the harbors on the Great Lakes, but when an appropriation is asked for a dinky stream or creek in New Jersey, what policy do they pursue and what kind of arguments do they make to the engineer—what kind of arguments does he listen to? He listens to arguments for the benefit of local business and in the interest of individuals and local private concerns which wish transportation facilities for their own benefit, an argument which never appeals to the engineers in our part of the country when we are asking for appropriations for harbors on the Great Lakes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has just stated the estimated tonnage for the Panama Canal. He stated also the tonnage through the Soo. The tonnage that passes through the Soo is very largely ore, valued at about $3 a ton. The gentleman thinks that a stream on the Atlantic Ocean is a "dinky" stream which carries 350,000 tons because 25,000 tons happens to be fertilizer. Fertilizer is worth more a ton than the ore which passes through the Soo.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. In just a minute. The gentleman thinks it is a proper expenditure of money to build the Panama Canal in the interest of commerce, does he not, when it is estimated that the American tonnage which will pass through the Panama Canal will be a million and a quarter tons? Here is a stream upon the Atlantic Ocean, which he characterizes as "dinky," for which we are appropriating in this bill $15,000, which carries one-third as much American tonnage as is estimated will pass through the Panama Canal.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. In a moment. Yet the gentleman thinks that is a "dinky" stream because it happens to be upon the Atlantic seacoast. I submit to the gentleman from Michigan and the gentleman from Wisconsin that if they are in favor of the Panama Canal—and certainly they make a noise like men who are in favor of it [laughter]—they ought not to characterize as a "dinky" stream on the Atlantic seacoast——

Mr. TREADWAY. A jerkwater.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. For which we appropriate $15,000 only, and yet which floats one-third as much commerce as will go through the Panama Canal.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I will.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The gentleman does the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] an injustice. He said "jerk-water stream."

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman has the wrong stream. The stream I had in mind was Coopers Creek, which has only $5,000 appropriation.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Three hundred and fifty-odd thousand tons floated annually with an appropriation of $5,000 for maintenance, compared with the Panama Canal through which, it is estimated, we will pass a million and a quarter of American tonnage. In other words, this little jerk-water stream, according to the gentleman's definition——

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. The revised edition.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi (continuing). According to the gentleman from Michigan, is to carry one-third as much commerce as is carried on the Panama Canal.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. The gentleman has stated that nearly all the business through the Soo Canal is iron ore.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Yes; ore.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Ore.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. There is an immense carriage——

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. How much?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I have not got the figures, but I could give——

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Four-fifths of it.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. There are immense carriages there of grain of different kinds, and here is a memorandum of one single shipment of grain. One vessel carrying 13,710 tons, 464,000 bushels, of wheat; enough wheat to make 30,000,000 loaves of bread——

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Provided you have the fertilizer to put on the land.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. The product of 25,000 acres of ground, only one of hundreds of shipments almost as large, constantly going through the canal.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Wait a minute; I will not yield further for that. Four-fifths of the tonnage that goes through the Soo is ore. Four-fifths of that 57,000,000. I am in favor of it. I believe that the returns from the money we have invested upon the Great Lakes and the returns for the money we have invested at the Soo have been ample to justify us many times over for the expenditure we have made; but if that be true that we have expended more than $40,000,000 at the Soo to carry a commerce valued at $3 a ton, the gentleman should not complain when we appropriated only $5,000 to take care of commerce on a "dinky" stream on the Atlantic with a commerce valued at $3 a ton.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a minute.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired.

Mr. MANN. But I ask unanimous consent for a minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for one minute. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. For the purpose of suggesting to the gentleman from Mississippi that he correct his amount. Four-fifths of the tonnage that goes through the Soo Canal is not iron ore. It is possible that four-fifths going east may be iron ore, I do not know.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Iron ore and coal I should have said. I will tell the gentleman where I got the figures. From the Detroit River. I took them from the Detroit River; 78,000,000 tons going through the Detroit River, just below the Soo, and four-fifths of that is iron ore and coal.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired; all time has expired, and the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Raccoon Creek, N. J.: For maintenance, $8,000.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

This is an item that generally provokes a great deal of jest in this House. It suggests the argument that is made against streams wholly within a State. Raccoon Creek is nothing of a joke, but it is sometimes referred to to convey the idea that there is a pork barrel in this bill and that we are appropriating money for streams that are worthless. Raccoon Creek produces nearly 90,000 tons of commerce—

Mr. MANN. I thought it was fur.

Mr. MOORE. And it is wholly within the State of New Jersey. It may be used as well as any other stream to illustrate the answer I desire to make to the gentlemen who have been arguing here against Federal appropriations for streams that are wholly within a State.

Mr. EDWARDS. Will the gentleman yield right there for a suggestion?

Mr. MOORE. Yes.

Mr. EDWARDS. The commerce on Raccoon Creek amounts to 92,688 tons, which has a value of $1,163,700.

Mr. MOORE. That is correct. And it may be possible that somewhere on that stream there is a manufacturer whose output goes out through that stream to the consumer somewhere, and it may be that, incidentally, the Federal appropriation is of advantage to that manufacturer. But I want to say to my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], who spoke about Coopers Creek——

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. MOORE. I will.

Mr. CALLAWAY. What is the question concerning this appropriation? How much it will reduce the freight?

Mr. MOORE. I will say that the gentleman has a misconception again of the purpose of a river and harbor bill.

Mr. CALLAWAY. And how much the public will benefit?

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman misconceives the purpose of the appropriation. The purpose of the appropriation is for the improvement of navigation and the development of commerce.

Mr. CALLAWAY. And has nothing to do with helping the public.

Mr. MOORE. Of course it has everything to do with helping the public. The purpose primarily of this appropriation is to improve navigation. And that is where these gentlemen who inveigh against the manufacturer on the stream are all wrong. It is for the purpose of improving navigation. The Federal jurisdiction enters in here, because we are appropriating to improve a navigable stream. The Government has jurisdiction over the navigability of a stream, whether it is in a State or whether it is interstate.

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE. I will.

Mr. SIMS. Is there any objection made to this particular appropriation?

Mr. MOORE. I am arguing a point in answer to some other arguments that were made here, and I am sure, if the gentleman will abide for a moment, he will be edified.

Mr. SIMS. I suppose, perhaps, the gentleman wanted to discuss something that he objected to when he offered an amendment to strike out the last word.

Mr. MOORE. I tried to get in at an appropriate place, and I am now coming in. If the gentleman wants to make a point of order, I shall have to argue again about the advisability of improving Raccoon Creek.

Mr. SIMS. It is so evident that the purpose of some gentleman is to kill time on this bill, rather than to secure its passage, that I thought it time to call attention to what is the cause for this attempt at delay.

Mr. MOORE. I think the gentleman's statement is entirely uncalled for. The gentleman has no warrant for saying that anybody on this side is endeavoring to kill time.

Mr. SIMS. I did not say that anyone on that side other than the gentleman himself was attempting to do so.

Mr. MOORE. Now, Mr. Chairman, what I want to say is that if somebody will invest $100,000 up a stream somewhere, making excavations, buying brick, and rearing a building, and employing every kind of labor in the construction of it, and then will invite men to come and receive employment in his establishment, he is deserving of encouragement, because he is making "two blades of grass grow where but one grew before." And if a man does so invest his money in an enterprise that gives employment to labor, that man ought not to be called upon to dredge out a stream at his own expense, a navigable stream coming under the jurisdiction of the Federal Government, for the benefit of the Government as well as for every other man who wants to locate on the stream. There is no justice or equity in imposing this obligation on the individual. This is a Government job, and that it does not pertain solely to the manufacturer who locates a mill on a stream I think I can show by referring again to that distinguished railroad magnate, who in 1907 so earnestly pleaded for the improvement of waterways in this country in order that the railroads might have relief. What did Mr. Hill say then? He said:

The severest pressure upon transportation facilities and the greatest increase of demand upon them originate in what is called the Middle West. The great alluvial district between the Alleghenies and the Rocky Mountains produces a considerable part of the food supply of the world. The 12 States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota, North Dakota, South Dakota, Iowa, Kansas, Nebraska, and Missouri contain more than half the farm property, if measured by value, in the United States. They contain about one-fourth of the total area of the Union and one-third of its population. In agriculture they are as important as all the rest of the country combined. In 1906 these 12 States raised 498,874,113 bushels of wheat, or 68 per cent of the total yield; 1,951,175,861 bushels of corn, or 67 per cent of the entire crop; 753,141,271 bushels of oats, or 78 per cent of the total crop; and 144,333,999 bushels of rye and barley, or 68 per cent of the total crop. Their production of butter, cheese, potatoes, hay, etc., was about one-half that of the whole country. They raise practically all its flax, and the aggregate of their farm products is almost exactly half that of the United States. From these fertile lands come the surplus agricultural product that constitutes the real wealth of this country, and, either directly or converted into meats and other foodstuffs, furnishes the body of our foreign exports. They are now only partially occupied and carelessly tilled. The time is coming when their product will be twice or fourfold what it is to-day. Even omitting their mineral wealth and their manufactured product, the latter being about one-third that of the country, and not considering their domestic commerce, which alone would tax their transportation facilities, the problem of getting these food supplies out of the central basin and into their ultimate markets is the most vital to its economic welfare that the country has to consider. It has been shown already that the overtaxed railroads must be supplemented with any other means of transportation available and that seacoast markets and ports of shipment must be increased for the sake of obtaining terminal facilities.

In this instance it is the farmer, not the manufacturer, who is trying to get to market. It is the farmer who is held up because the railroad transportation facilities of the country are not sufficient.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on this subject in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Salem River, N. J.: For maintenance, $10,000.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, it was suggested a few moments ago that the only purpose of this discussion has been to delay matters. I do not know to whom it was intended to apply, but let me say—and I think I have stated the matter fairly—that while I have many other cases which are similar to those which I have asked by amendment to have stricken from the bill, and which I would be glad to furnish the House, I do not think it is necessary to do so at this time. It seems to me it is improper for these propositions to go through with the bill, and I have so stated, based upon the engineers' reports, but there has been no purpose to delay. There has been a purpose to enlighten the House as to the kind of appropriations you are voting upon, and we are the ones to determine.

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS] a few moments ago, with the excellent judgment he has on this subject—and we know he is an authority—corrected the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MCLAUGHLIN] in a statement made a few moments before. It occurred to me that his information is wrong as to the amount of freight that goes through St. Marys. I had it here a moment ago. The gentleman ought to correct the RECORD so as to make it accurate. The amount of ore is not quite two-thirds, compared with all the other tonnage. It runs in a ratio of about 35 to 59, as I now remember.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Ore and coal.

Mr. FREAR. I did not understand that you included coal; if so, that will be pretty nearly the right proportion.

Now, I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that I do not care to detain the House any longer on this particular line of discussion. The question has been raised, What interest have we, what interest has an individual Member, in opposing an appropriation that is not justified? Here is a bill with $43,000,000. It amounts almost to an average of $1,000,000 to burden every State, my own included. If it is wrong in any particular—and, in my judgment, it is in many particulars—then to that extent it works an injustice to each State. I am not here attacking any particular proposition, as I explained to the gentleman from New Jersey a few moments ago. It happened by pure accident that those items were the reports that I happened to secure first in the list of appropriations. Many of these appropriations are for little inlets and little creeks and little harbors that are for the special interest of people who have located their factories there, people who are not entitled to aid. If so, they should be required to contribute their full share, or some share, which they are not doing under the bill now pending before the House.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, in response to the statement of the gentleman that he has been criticized, or that some gentlemen had been criticized, and that the charge had been made that they are trying to delay the proceedings and the passage of this bill, that criticism, I am sure, has not come from the committee.

It has always been the policy of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors to report its bill and take it up just as we have taken this bill up, under the five-minute rule, so that every item in it could be subjected to criticism and explanation called for by the committee of every item of appropriation carried in the bill, and I think that is perfectly proper. Only on one occasion in the past 12 years has a river and harbor bill been passed under suspension of the rules, and yet I suppose everybody will agree that there never has been a time when it could not have been so passed, for the very reason that we always believed and insisted that the bill ought to be submitted to the House, and that for every criticism that was just and that could properly be made an opportunity should be given to Members to make it.

So far as the committee is concerned, we have no quarrel with the distinguished gentleman except this: That if he picks out a few items and they are voted down, it is unfair then for him to say: "Now, these are samples, and the bill is full of them." I think the gentleman ought to continue to present his propositions, so that the committee can give whatever explanation it has of them, so that the country may judge whether or not this bill is framed upon proper lines. [Applause.]

And so far as the special interests are concerned, I do not know just exactly what that means. It is a term——

Mr. FREAR. I meant the local interests. I withdraw the term "special interests."

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I see no possibility, Mr. Chairman, by which we can improve the rivers and harbors of this country without contributing materially to the benefit of local interests, and I would like to ask the gentleman himself if he can conjure up a scheme by which we can improve the rivers and harbors of this country anywhere without particularly benefiting local interests, either at the harbor or along the banks of the river? And if it is not going to benefit local interests, how is it going to benefit the public interest? The public is simply the assembling of the local interests, of many of them.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman submit to an interruption?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. FREAR. The usual policy, as I have always understood, of the Government as to all the States is to improve the navigation, is to make its appropriations for the improvement of navigation. To that extent the State has practically limited its power. To that extent the Government limits its power and control in the States, and to that extent the appropriations ought to be made; but for the general navigation of a river; not to go up a stream to a particular little place and there stop, where it benefits only that particular little interest.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Why pick out a little place and say you will stop there if there is a substantial commerce at the little place? Why spend large sums for the benefit of a big place, where there is a big commerce, and then refuse to spend small sums to get to a smaller place, where perhaps there is a smaller commerce. The test is whether or not the appropriation is justified by the amount of commerce.

Mr. FREAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. FREAR. If the gentleman will bear with me, in the two cases I have cited, and others which I have here that I can offer if desired, they are cases of just the class where the commerce is especially small. It is of a class that is not warranted under any ordinary view, unless it be to aid a manufacturing establishment that needs additional depth for a harbor so as to get a larger boat in and out. The cases which I have suggested are of this class.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I only want to say that I had no thought of criticizing the committee or any member of it when I said what I did about wasting time; but the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] moved to strike out the last word in order to make a defense of Raccoon Creek, when it had not been assailed, and talked about the Plains of the West and the amount of grain and other things produced there. It was a very fine speech to listen to, but I thought perhaps the gentleman from Pennsylvania wanted to use time in order to prolong consideration of this bill. Now, we might just as well be frank about this matter. The people are not going to be fooled. I do not blame the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE]. He is opposed to a certain bill that we expect to bring up for consideration as soon as this is passed, and it is legitimate for him to do as he has, as he is opposed to the early consideration of the bill that is to follow this one.

Mr. MADDEN. No; he is on your side. [Laughter.]

Mr. SIMS. I may have been mistaken, but if the gentleman favors the bill to which I refer, he will appreciate the reason why I am saying what I am. I have been here 17 years, and I never before heard in the five-minute debate on the river and harbor bill when things were discussed that were not germane to the bill. This year a large amount of time is being expended in discussing matters that have no reference whatever to the bill. I admit that the committee have a right to defend every item that is attacked; but after 9½ hours' general debate, in which it was supposed that every opportunity was given for the criticism of items in this bill, it was supposed that we would get along more rapidly under the five-minute rule. More than six hours have now been spent under the five-minute rule, and 10 pages of the bill have been read. Now, I want to ask if anybody knows when this bill is going to be passed?

Mr. MOORE rose.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, let me finish my statement. My time is short. Every time I step out of this House—and I think others are having the same experience—Members are asking, "When are we going to vote on the tolls question?" I say, "As soon as the river and harbor bill is disposed of."

Mr. BUTLER. How many hours of debate are we to have?

Mr. SIMS. When there was an attempt made to have the river and harbor bill considered first it was stated that it would not take over a day and a half.

Mr. MURDOCK. Does not the gentleman realize that it is impossible for any man to pledge that or to make any promise as to the length of the debate under the five-minute rule?

Mr. SIMS. I know it is impossible, but I mean it was said that it was estimated it would not take more than a day and a half.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. It took three days last year. What did the man base his estimate on?

Mr. SIMS. I suppose it was thought this bill was such a good bill that there would be no prolonged discussion of it.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. No; he thought the consideration of this bill would not be interrupted by speeches on some other bill.

Mr. SIMS. There was talk of bringing up the Panama tolls bill first, and these assurances were given in order to prevent a rule being brought in before the river and harbor bill was considered. I do not blame the gentlemen on that side who are opposed to the bill——

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Who made those assurances?

Mr. SIMS. I meant estimates of the time that would be consumed.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has just stated that these assurances were made. Who made the assurances?

Mr. SIMS. I ought not to have used the word "assurances."

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman did use the word "assurances."

Mr. SIMS. In estimating the time that it would take, a day and a half was supposed to be all that would be required. I knew it was impossible to consider this bill in that time if there was any attempt whatever to prevent rapid action, as is usual on bills of this kind. Now, I should like to know if anybody has the slightest idea when this bill is to be allowed to come to a vote.

Mr. BUTLER. Next Thursday.

Mr. SIMS. I should like to know what assurance the gentleman has of that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman from Tennessee have five minutes more. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. SIMS. I do not ask for any more time unless some gentleman wants to ask a question.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the debate on this section and amendments thereto close in five minutes.

Mr. MOORE. I reserve the right to object, unless I can have that five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent that the debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE. Reserving the right to object, may I have that five minutes?

Mr. SPARKMAN. So far as I am concerned, I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, the strictures of the gentleman from Tennessee seem to be leveled especially against the gentleman from Pennsylvania for having very properly and in the right place made an argument in opposition to an amendment that was proposed to this bill.

Having watched the progress of this bill very carefully, I have not observed, so far, that any gentleman has made an argument that was not germane to the bill except the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS], who obtruded himself into the proceedings a few minutes ago and took up our time in undertaking to browbeat the Panama Canal bill through this House while we are discussing one of the great appropriation bills. The gentleman has given us one of the worst instances of bossism that we have seen in this House for many years. Having one and only one thought upon his mind, and being animated by those who are "higher up," and being insistent that a bill that bears his name shall be passed as speedily as possible—though there is great doubt about the ability of those "higher up" to hold the Members upon his own side in close allegiance to that bill—he comes into the House suddenly and insists that we shall suspend the transaction of our business to pass the measure that is to be known throughout the country, if it ever does pass, as "the Sims Panama repeal bill." But, unfortunately for him, we have the high example of the Speaker of this House, who, on last Friday, when the Claims Committee undertook to hold its place upon the calendar, stated that these great appropriation bills must be considered and must be considered in order.

In my judgment it is just as important now that we say to the farmer, who is toiling away to furnish produce and food for the people of the land, that he will be advantaged by improved waterways in his vicinity, as in the case of Raccoon Creek, to the tune of 45 cents per ton upon his fertilizer as against the $1.50 that he must pay for its transportation by rail. It is just as important to him in the long run as it is to have his rights and his dignity as an American citizen voted away by the passage of the Sims bill to repeal the Panama Canal tolls. [Applause.]

While I do not say it unkindly at all, I resent the notion, although I am not a member of the Rivers and Harbors Committee and have no right to speak for it, that any special interest shall walk in and strike the rivers and harbors bill out of its rightful place to consider a bill the consequences of which may be fateful to the people of the United States. We are more interested in the rivers and harbors just now than in the passage of the Sims bill, and the Members on that side will enjoy the discussion of this bill until the end rather than take up the complex and embarrassing problem of changing their votes to assimilate with those who are higher up and who have advocated a change of front. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I think it is perfectly natural for my distinguished friend from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS], for whom I have great respect and the most affectionate regard, to wonder why discussion should be allowed on any bill. [Laughter.] He has proposed a rule to the House on the most important measure that has been before the House in years that forbids amendment and cuts off discussion before it is well begun. So it is quite natural, and wholly appropriate, that he should take exception to the consideration of any measure where the right to amendment is still open and people may be heard, as they need to be. [Applause on the Republican side.]

He thinks—I will not say my distinguished friend himself thinks; he has been thought for by some one else, who has said that the tolls bill must be considered at once, that the right of discussion must be cut off, and that no right of amendment shall be permitted. While you may enforce that once, you can not enforce that proposition a second time and bring that case before this House while there is a respectable minority in it, as there now is. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Alloway Creek, N. J.: For maintenance, $3,000.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to oppose particularly any part of this bill, but I do want to say that the Interstate Commerce Commission must not only permit but must compel an increase of railroad rates in order to make some of the projects in this bill promote any increase of water traffic. Nothing, it seems to me, is more clearly proven than that shallow-water transportation—in channels less than 15 or 20 feet deep—can not be made to pay. The Erie Canal has been referred to as a regulator of railroad rates. It used to be a regulator of railroad rates many years ago, though its influence in that line has been somewhat exaggerated by many writers. The canal and the Hudson River were in operation long before the railroads, and the canal and river boating interests opposed the building of railroads as long as they could. The granting of a charter to the Hudson River Railroad was held up for several years by their opposition, and the reason for the opposition was distinctly stated to be fear of the competition of the railroad. That such opposition was not without reason is shown by the fact that the railroad has pretty nearly driven the canal out of business. It was the low railroad rates that have constantly brought down canal rates, instead of the canal rates bringing down railroad rates, and in recent years it has been necessary to remove the toll charges on the canal to enable it to live. Even with the waterway maintained by the taxpayers of the State of New York, which means that the taxpayers have paid the greater part of the canal freight charges, its traffic has continued to dwindle. In my opinion it will be the same with the new barge canal which is now nearing completion at a cost of $150,000,000. A 12-foot channel is not deep enough to make its expense a paying proposition. Only a ship canal, not less than 25 feet deep, is really worth while, and I believe that such a canal should be built from Lake Ontario to the Hudson River by the National Government, with the cooperation, perhaps, of the State of New York.

Something has been said about the effect of water transportation on the rates for carrying coal. I live in the city of Poughkeepsie, about halfway between New York and Albany on the Hudson. Until recently all the coal yards in that city were on the water front, but since the completion of the Poughkeepsie bridge and its railroads connecting directly with the anthracite coal fields of Pennsylvania the coal yards have been moved away from the river up to the railroad in spite of the fact that we have nearly 30 feet depth of water from Poughkeepsie to New York. There is no possible explanation of the removal of the coal yards from the river, except that water transportation is not as advantageous as the railroad transportation. It is, of course, partly a matter of wages and partly a matter of handling and partly a matter of hauling for delivery. Where the coal comes in barges it is loaded from the mines into cars and then dumped into the boat, and then at the end of the trip it is mined out of the boat and put into little tram cars which carry it to the storage bins. Then it has to be delivered to customers by an uphill team haul. When it comes over the railroad it is dumped into a car and transported in many cases directly to where it is consumed. There is less handling and less breakage, and that fact seems to deprive water transportation of its advantages. Wages are too high in this country to do profitably things that are done in Europe, but even in Germany, where the Government owns both the canals and the railroads, it keeps the railroad rates in some cases up to enable the waterways to live.

Mr. TEN EYCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. Yes.

Mr. TEN EYCK. Is not the reason why the railroads carry the coal because the railroads in a great many instances own the coal mines or work with other railroads that own the coal mines? And is it not a fact that waterways do not own the coal mines?

Mr. PLATT. That is possible; but let me give the gentleman an instance. The Delaware & Hudson Co. owned coal mines and built a canal directly to the Hudson River at Kingston. It made so much money that it afterwards built a railroad, and after a while, owning both canal and railroad, it abandoned the canal. Now, if the canal were the more profitable means of transportation, why should it abandon the canal rather than the railroad?

Mr. CONRY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. Yes.

Mr. CONRY. Is it not true that the Delaware & Hudson, before it abandoned the canal, controlled all the terminals?

Mr. PLATT. Yes; it controlled both the canal terminals and the rail terminals of its own line; it controlled the railroad and the canal, and it abandoned the canal as being the least profitable.

Mr. EDWARDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. Yes.

Mr. EDWARDS. Does the gentleman say as a general proposition that the railroad rates are cheaper than water rates?

Mr. PLATT. For long distances they are cheaper than the shallow-water rates.

Mr. EDWARDS. Is not the case the gentleman cites an exception to the rule?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether there is any man in Congress, except one, from the State of New York who will challenge the fact that the Erie Canal has cheapened the price of transportation. It is true the Erie Canal was built long before the railroads. It was built in competition with the old stagecoach, and it did reduce the rates of the stagecoach, although the travel was slower. In the course of time railroads were built. They were in competition with the Erie Canal. The Erie Canal was enlarged, and then the railroads began to put down their rates during the summertime of six months in which we could operate the Erie Canal—from May to November—and then they put them up during the other six months of the year when the canal was not in operation. The people got a partial benefit, and a large part of the freight was moved during those summer months both by canal and by railroad. That was on account of the canal improvement and the deepening of the water in the canal. But after a little the shippers began to ask the railroads for a contract for the year round at the same price as the summer price, much below the former charges of the railroad. My colleague seems to think that if the canal had not been enlarged the railroads would voluntarily have gone into the same line of business.

How were the railroads able to lower their freight rates? It compelled them to adopt all modern improvements. They took out the curves, they shortened the lines, they lessened the grades, they put on heavier equipments, the big mogul locomotives were invented, and freight trains four times as long or more were moved by one locomotive, so that finally we had the cheapest railroad transportation along the line of the Erie Canal and the Lakes and parallel with it clear down into some of the Southern States, between the East and the West, that there was anywhere in the whole world. [Applause.] And then the railroads increased their facilities and began to encroach on the rivalry of the canal. There were people in the State who knew the history of it, and a proposition was made to undertake a deeper channel, one of 12 feet, and, as the supreme test of the sincerity of the people, there was a vote on bonding the State for $102,000,000 to make a 12-foot waterway. That was carried by a majority of votes. Were those men who voted for it lacking in intelligence, or did they believe from the history of the former improvement, that another improvement would still lower freight rates?

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PAYNE. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. Is it not a fact that the whole State of New York voted against the barge canal except the city of New York and the city of Buffalo?

Mr. PAYNE. I think the majorities came from the city of New York and the city of Buffalo, but all through the State and country districts there was a very large minority vote in favor of deepening the Erie Canal, and the reason for it was this: The farmers up the State believed that they were providing for cheaper transportation from the granaries of Iowa and Illinois in competition with their own freight rates to the city of New York, and many were afraid of that cheaper transportation bringing those cereals down to their own market in the city of New York, and that was the reason there was a large vote against it in the rural districts; but the majority were in favor of it because of their experience with it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have a few minutes more.

Mr. HUGHES of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, was it not really Tammany Hall that gave that majority?

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, no. I sat in the Republican State convention with the gentleman's father, on the committee on resolutions, year after year. Sometimes I was chairman of that committee on resolutions and was frequently a member of it, and so was the gentleman's father; and every time we came into that committee the gentleman's father—and the gentleman inherits this—was opposed to the Erie Canal [laughter] and opposed to any extension, opposed to any improvement of it, and insisted on a reactionary plank in the Republican platform. [Laughter.] There were 34 members of the committee, and I think on one or two occasions there were one or two other gentlemen who voted with the gentleman's father on this proposition. Tammany Hall! Why, that was a Republican convention, a convention of the Republican Party, generally the dominant party in the State of New York; and it was an overwhelming majority—a member of the committee coming from each congressional district, a majority of them from up the State, among the farmers—who voted in favor of the improvement of the Erie Canal.

Mr. PLATT rose.

Mr. PAYNE. I see the gentleman has another question. [Laughter.]

Mr. PLATT. I referred to the vote on the canal referendum. Was it not Tammany Hall that carried it?

Mr. PAYNE. I just answered the gentleman's question—that the majority came largely from the city of New York and the city of Buffalo. Whether it was Tammany Hall or not, it is for the gentleman to infer. I think that probably my friend here, Mr. CONRY, would say that it came from Tammany Hall.

Mr. CONRY. Yes; it was. [Laughter.]

Mr. PAYNE. But it came from the big business interests in these business centers, and we got that large vote in the State, notwithstanding the fact that the farmers thought they were taxing themselves to furnish cheaper transportation for the grain coming down from the West to their own markets in the city of New York. Is there any man in the United States, outside of my colleague, who questions the fact that water transportation on parallel lines always has and always will cheapen railroad freight? [Applause.] Oh, but you say the Interstate Commerce Commission is keeping down railroad rates. Well, rely wholly upon that and stop building your waterways and see where you will land.

There will be that necessity of improving the railroads and improving the rolling stock of railroads and improving their management by which they are enabled as now to meet water competition. So go on, gentlemen, and build your harbors and clean out your rivers, when you have got one, but for God's sake do not undertake to make a creek into a river [laughter]; always clean out your rivers. Where there is a legitimate chance for water transportation, improve it all along the line, and you will find that history in the future will work out as has history in the past—that water transportation is, and always has been, a powerful factor in reducing competing railroad freight rates on railroad lines. [Loud applause.]

Mr. MCLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving harbor at Pittsburgh, Pa.: For maintenance, $5,000.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to inquire of the chairman of the committee, the distinguished gentleman from Florida, regarding appropriations for the Erie Harbor. I do not propose to criticize the committee or the engineers or pay any compliments to my colleagues on the floor of the House, and neither do I propose to discuss any subjects that are not germane to this bill, but I find on page 7 an appropriation of $167,375 for completing the improvements at the harbor at Buffalo, which is probably 80 miles to the east of our harbor. I also find on page 39 an item for improving the harbor at Conneaut, Ohio, carrying an appropriation of $243,530. Conneaut Harbor is 30 miles to the west of us. I also find for Fairport an appropriation of $158,000—Fairport is about 70 miles from Erie—and an appropriation for Cleveland, 99 miles away, of $200,000; and, going a little farther, to the harbor of Toledo, about 200 miles away, I find an appropriation of $135,000. I assume it is the policy of the Government and of this committee to improve all the harbors of Lake Erie. Now, inasmuch as the harbor of Erie during 1912 had a commerce of 3,135,725 tons, at a value of $82,507,650, leads me to ask the committee what appropriations are available for Erie Harbor during this year?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, the reason there is no item placed in this bill for Erie Harbor is that the Chief of Engineers made no estimate for such an item in this bill. He states in his report:

That no estimate for funds is made for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, for Erie Harbor because funds on hand are sufficient for ordinary maintenance during the fiscal year, and that is all there is to do there.

The project upon which we have worked for quite a number of years there has been completed and all that is needed is the maintenance of the harbor channel and the harbor. There was on the 30th of June last year $84,164 on hand, and there is on hand at the present time $41,600, which the engineers say is quite enough to maintain the channel and harbor until the next bill.

Mr. SHREVE. Then I understand there is an unexpended balance of over $40,000, and the engineers estimate this sum would be sufficient for maintenance during the fiscal year.

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is the estimate; yes, sir.

Mr. EDWARDS. I would like to suggest to the gentleman in that connection not only is the amount on hand to which the chairman referred, but on July 1, 1913, there was $33,905 covered by an uncompleted contract.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, instead of saying for the fiscal year ending June 30 of this year, I should have said until the 4th of March, 1915, when another bill will be due.

Mr. MOORE. May I ask the gentleman is it not a fact that the State of Pennsylvania also makes an appropriation for Erie Harbor?

Mr. SHREVE. Yes; I am very glad my colleague from Pennsylvania mentions that fact. The policy of the State of Pennsylvania is to contribute largely to her harbors—the two principal harbors, one at Philadelphia and one at Erie. Way back more than a century ago this harbor was established, and a considerable sum of money has been expended by the State during all that time. During the last four or six years the appropriations by the State of Pennsylvania for the Erie Harbor amounts to more than twice, or double, the amount received from the National Government. In this connection I desire to say that all appropriations from the National Government for all time are as follows:

Appropriations and allotments.

To June 30, 1890 (as listed in H. Doc. No. 421)	$841,867.23
Sept. 19, 1890	40,000.00

Mar. 3, 1899	125,000.00
June 13, 1902	125,000.00
Mar. 3, 1905	125,000.00

The natural advantages of the harbor have assisted materially in the low cost of improvements and maintenance, but the time is soon coming when larger developments will have to be made to accommodate the increasing shipping. Fully realizing the importance of these improvements, the city planning committee, acting under recent legislation enacted by the Pennsylvania Legislature, have prepared elaborate plans for harbor improvements. The construction of extensive docks is being considered by the State and city, which will require a uniform harbor depth of 22 feet, and the anchorage basin will have to be enlarged to meet the rapidly growing requirements of commerce.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Delaware River, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and Delaware: Continuing improvement and for maintenance from Allegheny Avenue, Philadelphia, to the sea, $1,000,000: Provided, That the Secretary of War may enter into a contract or contracts for such materials and work as may be necessary to prosecute the said project, to be paid for as appropriations may from time to time be made by law, not to exceed in the aggregate $1,000,000, exclusive of the amounts herein and heretofore appropriated.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I believe this is the first very large item we have struck in this bill, and it seems to me that $2,000,000 is easily mentioned; but what is the necessity for it? We hear a great deal about the necessity for a 40-foot waterway at Philadelphia and a 40-foot waterway at Boston, to compete with a 40-foot waterway at New York. I suppose in the course of time we western people will get the fever as badly as they have it in "Bosting" and Philadelphia, and we will want a 40-foot waterway down the Detroit River, and 40-foot harbors at Chicago, Milwaukee, and Buffalo, and at Duluth, and all the other numerous harbors on the Lakes.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Not yet. Just a second. I do not wish to take too much time. [Laughter.] Now, there are only a few large vessels in the world which draw 40 feet. A great amount of the commerce is not carried in those vessels. There are only a few ports abroad which they can go into. If we make a 40-foot channel at Boston and a 40-foot channel at New York, which we have, and a 40-foot channel at Philadelphia, then we must have a 40-foot channel at Galveston and other points in the South. For what? Perhaps one imaginary vessel in the course of a year, or, perhaps, if the imagination works well, they can get more than one. Philadelphia is a great commercial and marine port, entitled to everything that is reasonably fair. But after all, the economic question is whether the Government, the people at large, out of the Public Treasury need to provide a number of 40-foot channels. The commerce at Philadelphia is growing, the commerce at Newport is growing, the commerce of the various other cities is growing, although just at present the commerce is growing more in the way of importation than it is in the way of exportation.

Mr. DONOHOE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman has something relevant, I will be glad to yield.

Mr. DONOHOE. I will say to my friend from Illinois that we are striving for a 35-foot channel at Philadelphia rather than a 40-foot channel just now.

Mr. MANN. Well, I have heard this talk for years. The gentlemen want always something more; and what they are striving for is a 40-foot channel.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I will say to the gentleman that the present project is for 35 feet.

Mr. MANN. I understand. The same thing is true over at Boston, although we are surveying for a 40-foot channel.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MANN. I knew I would get a rise. [Laughter.]

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. It is proper sometimes to rise.

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. Let me call to the attention of the gentleman that it is not a fad with us at Boston. The needs of commerce seem to justify a channel of 40 feet.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman insist that it is a fad?

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] insists it is a fad with most of us.

Mr. MADDEN. The Delaware sleeps within its own banks.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, it is a peculiar thing in the consideration of a river and harbor bill, which every Member of the House who has been rather quiet on the subject, as I have been, must have noticed. Any gentleman who rises to favor a proposition proceeds without difficulty. When any gentleman rises to offer any kind of a suggestion adverse to any proposition in this bill immediately four or five gentlemen, from all parts of the House, get up and want to interrupt him and take up his time, and they succeed in doing it, as they have my time in this case. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] yield to me for a question?

Mr. MOORE. For a question; yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Has it been determined yet whether the banks of the Delaware will remain intact if we dig a 40-foot channel?

Mr. MOORE. If the gentleman will allow me, I will say that the wind of Chicago has not yet struck the banks of the Delaware.

Mr. MADDEN. If it does, it may hurt them.

Mr. MOORE. It may affect the flow of the tide, but I do not think it will. Of course everyone in this House understands that what has been said about the Delaware by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], the leader of the minority, is partly in the nature of airy persiflage, and that he has no intent whatever of destroying the effect of this item. What he has said, however, so far as the depth of harbors is concerned, is very important, and I am not altogether displeased that he has raised the question with reference to the Delaware River.

Mr. MADDEN. What does the gentleman mean to say? That what I have said, or what my colleague said, was mere persiflage?

Mr. MOORE. Perhaps the gentleman from Illinois ought not to raise that question.

I believe the Government would save money in the construction of battleships, I believe it would save money in appropriations for rivers and harbors, and I believe it would accommodate itself to a standard which the other nations are gradually setting if it would fix a limitation upon the draft of battleships which would also carry with it a limitation of artificial harbor depths.

So long as one nation continues to build battleships of greater draft than another, so long will the other nation build battleships of that draft; and so long as one nation digs its harbors out to a certain depth, so long will other nations competing with that nation in commerce and business dig their harbors out to the same depth. And so long as one port has an exceptional depth over other ports seeking business, those other ports will seek to attain that depth. Hence, if we are to have only one harbor in the United States of 40 feet depth, the great ships of the world will seek that harbor, and hence there will be a monopoly of business in that harbor and a centralization of power and influence at that point; and it seems to me that that is the very thing which ought to be discouraged in an appropriation bill intended to accommodate all the rivers and harbors of a great country like this.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to his colleague?

Mr. MOORE. I do.

Mr. BUTLER. What limit would the gentleman put upon the depth of the river—100 feet? [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE. No; I would not. I have introduced several bills and amendments placing a limitation on the vessel draft of 35 feet. That is to say, it might be wise to have the draft of naval vessels limited, because that would help to control the draft of merchant vessels. The Panama Canal is going to limit the draft of all vessels passing through it to 40 feet. Now, if we have one port which has a depth of 40 feet, as we have at New York, Boston is going to aspire to that 40 feet, and Philadelphia, in turn, will aspire to that depth, and so will Baltimore.

In 1911 the promise was held out in the law that we should have 35 feet in the Delaware; we were to have it at the rate of $2,000,000 a year to complete the 35-foot channel, and we are gradually getting there.

This year we have an appropriation for a million dollars, with a provision for a continuing contract, for which Philadelphia thanks the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. It will prevent waste, and it will give us a chance to step forward, and it will bring new business to the great port of Philadelphia. But it is not for the benefit of the city of Philadelphia alone; Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and Delaware will be benefited by it. In addition to that, this great Government of ours gets out of the port of Philadelphia more than $20,000,000 a year in revenue which it collects at that port. This is made possible by the improvement of the Delaware River, and is a good return for the expenditure of the million dollars cost and the conditional $1,000,000 herein invested by the Government.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. MOORE. Yes.

Mr. SABATH. I wish to ask the gentleman, Who made that promise two years ago?

Mr. MOORE. The Congress of the United States and the President, by the passage of a law which put upon the statute books a provision for the establishment of a 35-foot channel, and which directs, upon the report of the United States Engineers, that that work shall be prosecuted so that it would be completed in six years. That was a wise provision, because rivers do silt up, and waste does ensue when the work is not expeditiously prosecuted. And this year, thanks to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, we are put in a fair position to go ahead with the work and keep faith and fulfill the promise made to the city of Philadelphia.

Mr. SABATH. So that the Democratic Congress is doing well for the city of Philadelphia?

Mr. MOORE. Yes. The Democratic Congress is doing well for the city of Philadelphia in that respect, and is continuing the good work begun in a Republican Congress.

Mr. DONOHOE. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that the amount carried in the bill this year will be sufficient to prosecute the work so that it will be finished in five years, according to the report of the engineers. A smaller amount would not be sufficient to do the work at the rate of speed promised two years ago, but this bill promises to do the work so that it shall be completed within five years.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Appoquinimink River, Del.: Completing improvement in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 149, Sixty-third Congress, first session, $11,000.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The unpronounceable name attached to this stream prevents me from speaking it, but I can pronounce the next name.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman might move to improve the name. [Laughter.]

Mr. FREAR. The next project is Murderkill stream. I am making this statement in response to the suggestion of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS], who said it was unfair, which I concede, to refer to any number of streams without identifying those streams or the improvements that have been projected. This is the first stream I have on the list, and I have an even dozen here in line with it that I would like to refer to, but I will not trespass upon the courtesy of the committee, because I think you have been very generous with the time this afternoon. I have this list, which I am willing to furnish to the gentleman who makes this proposition.

The cases are all somewhat similar to those which we have discussed, for which I have offered amendments. If I thought there was a possibility of securing favorable action on this amendment or any other, I would offer it.

As I said, I have given as careful consideration as I could to the engineers' reports. In some cases the engineers differ in their judgment. Of course the Chief Engineer eventually determines what the action of the department shall be; but I thought it no more than just, in response to the suggestion of the gentleman, that I mention the fact that I have 12 streams, in the next two or three pages of the bill for which appropriations have been asked and to which the same arguments apply. Later on I hope to make some further suggestions, whether they are considered by the committee or not.

These are small rivers. The appropriations for them will not, I assume, total over $200,000; but I believe they occupy practically the same position as the last two for which I have offered amendments.

Mr. BROCKSON. Mr. Chairman, I oppose the amendment to strike out the last word. I will pronounce the name which the gentleman says is unpronounceable. It is Appoquinimink. I will call the gentleman's attention to the fact that in 1912 that river had a commerce of 27,370 tons, valued at $1,712,400. In addition to that, there is a boat line from Odessa, on that river, to the city of Philadelphia, which stops at various points along the line, and carries thousands of passengers yearly.

As to the Murderkill River, that has a traffic of 34,895 tons, valued at $1,472,750, and also has a considerable passenger traffic.

I desire to give a concrete example of how the improvement of these rivers does reduce freight rates. I have in my hand a letter from a merchant in the town of Clayton, which shows that the freight on a barrel of oil shipped from Philadelphia to Clayton by water is 50 cents, by rail 85 cents. The rate by water on general merchandise is 10 cents per hundred, and by rail 16 cents per hundred. That is for freight brought in the Smyrna River, which has no item in this bill. That river is similar to those to which the gentleman has just referred. The water route for which these freight rates are charged is down the Delaware River and Delaware Bay into the Smyrna River to Smyrna Landing. At that point the freight is loaded upon wagons and is hauled two miles to Clayton. Even with that haul, the difference in freight is what I have stated. This not only saves the people the difference between the water rate and the rail rate, but the railroad company in the past has kept its rates down to compete with the water rates.

The facts as to the Smyrna River apply equally to these other rivers.

Mr. FREAR. I did not discuss the merits of this proposition, although I should be glad to do so; but I will ask the gentleman how much will the proposed improvement here reduce the freight rate on this river with the unpronounceable name? Is not this improvement simply to make cut-offs for the aid of navigation rather than for the establishment of any new lines of navigation?

Mr. BROCKSON. It is not to establish any new lines, but it is to shorten the existing line. That will reduce the expense to the navigation company, and will, therefore, to a considerable extent reduce the freight charges.

Mr. FREAR. Is there any such proposition in the engineers' reports?

Mr. BROCKSON. Just how much the reduction will be I do not know.

Mr. FREAR. Is that suggested in the engineers' reports, either directly or indirectly?

Mr. BROCKSON. I do not know.

Mr. FREAR. Then why does the gentleman say there will be a reduction?

Mr. BROCKSON. It is a matter of common knowledge that if a boat with a crew of men can cover a route in three hours, when it formerly took six hours to cover the same route, the expense to the transportation company will be reduced.

Mr. FREAR. Certainly; but is that any evidence that they will reduce the freight rates?

Mr. BROCKSON. It is the same evidence that we have in other cases. If the expense to the transportation company is less, the freight rate will be lowered.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. In support of what the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. BROCKSON] has just said, I want to add that the Mispillion River, which he fails to mention——

Mr. FREAR. That is on the list I have here.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The Mispillion River has a tonnage of over 140,000 tons, valued at $5,602,000. The total amount carried in the bill for the improvement and maintenance of all three of these rivers, the Appoquinimink, the Murderkill, and the Mispillion, is only $22,000.

Mr. EDWARDS. I should like to suggest to my colleague on the committee that the total tonnage of these three rivers amounts in valuation to $8,787,550 and the appropriation for all three of them is only $22,000.

Mr. FREAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDWARDS. Yes.

Mr. FREAR. I have the report on this item before me. It recites that by digging a canal for a distance of nearly 2 miles, 9,000 feet, the Government will save 2½ miles for the small vessels that occasionally ply on this creek or river.

In other words, we are asked to cut a canal 9,000 feet long, at an expense of $70,000, to shorten the distance, which is now taken up by bends in the river, two and a half miles. That is the proposition, and it is an objectionable feature in every way, because it does not affect the freight rates.

Mr. EDWARDS. If it can be done economically and in the interest of the development of commerce, it ought to be done.

Mr. FREAR. If the facts warranted it and the community considered this canal so important, the people there ought to be willing to make an appropriation, just as they did in Boston and as they are asked to do in these two cases mentioned in the committee's report. Is the gentleman a member of the Rivers and Harbors Committee?

Mr. EDWARDS. I am.

Mr. FREAR. Then you have established a rule that small communities should contribute one-half of the expense in certain instances. Why not here, when the project is simply to shorten the distance 2½ miles?

Mr. EDWARDS. We have established a rule that works well all over the country. It depends, I presume, upon the point of view, however. In answer to the gentleman's question which he propounded a few minutes ago, whether the commerce on this particular river he refers to justifies the expenditure, the reports of the engineers say that it does. Furthermore, no item in this bill is reported upon until the judgment of the engineers has been had on it favorably, and no bill comes before the House more thoroughly considered than the river and harbor bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving inland waterway between Rehoboth Bay and Delaware Bay, Del.: Continuing improvement, $60,000: Provided, That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to condemn a right of way through the tracks of the Maryland, Delaware & Virginia Railway Co. where the line of said waterway intersects said railroad tracks, the basis of condemnation to be the building, maintenance, and operation of a proper drawbridge by the United States, or the payment by the United States to the railroad company of such sum of money as may be awarded in the condemnation proceedings, as full compensation for such right of way, including actual cost of constructing such bridge and the capitalized cost of its maintenance and operation, whichever method may, in the judgment of the Secretary of War, be deemed most advantageous and economical to the United States; and any funds appropriated for improving said waterway are hereby made available for paying the award that may be made in said proceedings: Provided further, That of the appropriation herein made the sum of $12,300, or so much thereof as shall be necessary, may be applied to the restoration of the channel between Assawaman Bay and Indian River Bay, and for the repair and alteration of existing bridges built by the United States across said channel.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 5, page 13, after the word "the," strike out the words "Maryland, Delaware" and insert in lieu thereof the words "Delaware, Maryland."

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is the name of a railroad, and the words "Delaware" and "Maryland" were transposed, and the amendment is simply to transpose them back again.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was considered and agreed to.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to call attention of the House to the fact that this is the beginning of the inland waterways.

Mr. MOORE. What inland waterways does the gentleman refer to?

Mr. CALLAWAY. I am referring to the general inland waterway running from Boston to the Rio Grande.

Mr. MOORE. This item has nothing to do with that in any way.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Is it not a segment of it?

Mr. MOORE. No; it has nothing to do with the Atlantic coastal proposition.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving inland waterway from Delaware River to Chesapeake Bay, Del. and Md., by the purchase of the existing Chesapeake & Delaware Canal and appurtenant property, in accordance with the project recommended by the Chief of Engineers in paragraph 3 of his report dated August 9, 1913, as published in House Document No. 196, Sixty-third Congress, first session, $1,300,000. And the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to purchase said canal and appurtenant property at a cost not to exceed the amount herein appropriated for such purpose.

Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Chairman, I made a speech in the House on the 6th day of February, 1907, which was carefully prepared. I will not take the time now to read it, but I ask unanimous consent to print an extract from it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing an extract from a speech made by him on February 6, 1907. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The extract from the speech follows:

"I am one of those who oppose the national ownership and operation of the transportation agencies of the country, whether on the water or on the land, and yet I believe that the sentiment in favor of national ownership and operation of railroads is growing so in the country as that nothing short of efficient governmental regulation of rates through State and National railroad commissions will check it.

"I heartily subscribe to this course. I am proud of the fact that I was the first man in this Chamber on either side who gave his hearty approval, in an address to this House, of the first definite rate recommendation made to Congress by the present President of the United States. I gave my vote cheerfully in support of the recent rate legislation, but I believed then, and I believe now, that that legislation does not go far enough to meet the situation and to satisfy the demand of the country for relief.

"If, as under the Hepburn bill, Congress can clothe the Interstate Commerce Commission with power to fix a rate on one railroad between two points, it can clothe the commission with power to fix rates on all roads between all points, and this should be done. If it can clothe the commission with power to fix a rate, it can also direct the principles and policies upon which this rate fixing shall proceed. More than that, it ought to declare its will under its power and leave as little exercise of power for the commission as the circumstances will permit. In my opinion, rate legislation ought to be immediately passed, clothing the Interstate Commerce Commission with plenary powers to fix rates—with the power to value the various railroads of the country and to fix rates upon the basis of such valuation, so that a fair interest will be permitted upon the basis of such fair valuation; with the power to fix classification and to prevent any change thereof, so that the rate may not be changed by a change of classification on the part of the railroads, and providing that when such rate is fixed no inferior Federal court shall, by injunction, disturb the operation of the rate. But, Mr. Chairman, when all this shall be done, if it ever be done, still it will be true that under such perfect power, wisely exercised with justice alike to the railroads and to the people, the rate can not be as cheap as a water rate, and hence we can not escape this question in the improvement of rivers and harbors of the Republic: What consideration, if any, shall be given to the effect upon freight rates that will be produced by such improvements?

"Here, as in many other instances, extreme views are taken. It is quite common to hear it said if this or that waterway is created, so long as it reduces rates, we don't care whether a single ton of freight is ever water borne or not. On the other hand, you will hear it said that rivers and waterways ought to be improved solely from the standpoint of the actual commerce which will be water borne by the improvement. In my judgment the truth lies between these two extremes. The first would be unjust to the railroads, for when the States have chartered railroads, and acting in good faith their owners have invested millions and built lines and developed the country, it is unjust to create an artificial waterway solely for the purpose of bringing freight rates down to a lower point than they could be forced by effective commissions under the constitutional rights of the railroads to earn legitimate profits upon a fair valuation of their property.

"Nor would such action, if taken, be remunerative to the people unless the conditions exist, to which I shall hereafter allude, when I state what I conceive to be the proper basis of action, for the obvious reason that boats could not profitably maintain themselves in a competitive struggle with the railroads, and hence policy unites with justice against such action.

"On the other hand, it would be unjust to the people to go to the extent of saying that the improvement of a river or a waterway must solely depend upon the amount of actual commerce to be borne by it, for if when it is improved the country tributary to it develops and the commerce is so augmented as that the railroads could meet the water rate, and do meet it, certainly the people are entitled to this natural, cheaper method of carrying their products, so that the wise, just view appears to me to be this: In the improvement of a river or the creation of a waterway the controlling question should be, Are there along its course quantities of heavy, bulky freight which can be moved slowly and which naturally could be more cheaply water borne than by rail? If so, with due regard to the value of the improvement, viewed from such standpoint and the cost of the improvement, such improvement should be undertaken, and the happy result will follow which has invariably followed the improvement of such rivers and canals not only in this country but in Europe; namely, cheapening the carrying of heavy raw materials, such as coal, iron ore, cotton, wheat, lumber, sand, brick, stone, and building materials, so stimulating the whole section and augmenting its production as that the railroads make up in increased passenger and fast freight traffic more than they lose by the carrying of all this heavy and slow-moving freight by water. In a degree it will be also true that a tendency to lower rates on all commerce carried will be produced, since, if the railroad rate is too high on any given product, the tendency will be to have it carried by the same boats which carry these heavy, bulky, slow-moving freights.

"Thus a happy, natural balance is struck, alike beneficial to the railroads and the people. Such I believe to be the wise middle course to be pursued in appropriating for the improvement of rivers and waterways, one which recognizes a competitive and yet cooperative utilization of all the means of transportation. In this country the waterways through the Great Lakes, the Erie Canal, the Mississippi and Ohio Rivers are fine illustrations of this view."

Mr. BROCKSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

THE PURCHASE OF THE CHESAPEAKE AND DELAWARE CANAL BY THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. BROCKSON. Mr. Chairman, the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal extends through the State of Delaware and the Eastern Shore of Maryland from Delaware City, Del., to Chesapeake City, Md., and connects the Delaware River with a tributary of the Chesapeake Bay.

The construction of this canal was commenced in 1824. It was put in operation in 1829. The cost of constructing this canal is shown to have been $2,500,000. Of that amount the United States paid $450,000, the State of Pennsylvania paid $100,000, the State of Maryland paid $50,000, the State of Delaware paid $25,000, and the remainder was paid by the citizens of those three States.

This canal is about 13§ miles long—about 12 miles in Delaware and about 2 miles in Maryland. It is 10 feet deep and 36 feet wide at the bottom and contains three locks, which are 220 feet long in the clear by 24 feet wide in the clear.

The Chesapeake & Delaware Canal Co. still owns and operates this canal. The United States and the three States which I have mentioned still own stock in that company, representing the money which they contributed for the construction of the canal.

The pending bill provides for the purchase of this canal. I am fully satisfied that it should be owned and operated by the Government.

In time of war this canal enlarged might be of great value to the United States in transporting troops, ammunition, and supplies and in moving and shifting the small-draft boats of the Navy.

The canal's entrance into the Delaware River is already well protected by two strong forts—Fort Delaware and Fort Du Pont.

This canal will form one of the most important links in the proposed intracoastal waterway from the northern Atlantic ports to the southern Atlantic ports.

The enlargement of this short canal alone will enable much coastwise trade to avoid several hundred miles of ocean voyage and will greatly facilitate and increase interstate commerce by water.

The special board of Engineer officers of the Government that made the survey and investigation for the Atlantic intracoastal waterway recommended the immediate purchase of this canal. The Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors concurred in that recommendation. The Chief of Engineers of the Army also recommended its purchase.

The report of the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors states that:

Aside from its future value as a link in a through waterway connecting northern and southern ports, it will be of great value to existing commerce and will yield immediate benefits. The board therefore recommends the purchase of the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal at a price not exceeding $2,514,289.70, or its acquirement by condemnation proceedings if necessary.

The report of the special board of Engineers officers as to the usefulness of this canal in its relation to existing waterways and their commerce states:

The data obtained can be only a fraction of the total commerce, but the statement below is compiled from the figures received from shippers as to their own shipments and may be considered authentic as far as it goes. Some of the heaviest shippers were among those who failed to furnish figures.

According to the responses received the following existing commerce could and would use a free canal to advantage:

Shipments from southern points.	Tons.
Iron	120,000
Lumber	496,889
Tomatoes	1,361
Coal	240,000
Chemicals	17,000
Paints, etc	600
Miscellaneous	231,564
Total	1,107,414

In addition to the above there was reported freight amounting in value to $375,000, but the tonnage was not stated.

Shipments from northern points.	Tons.
Bridge iron	18,000
Coal	872,518
Tomatoes	16,748
Oils	600
Granite, etc	40,111
Fruit	300
Miscellaneous	481,931
Total	1,430,208

In addition to the above, freight worth $195,000 was reported, but the tonnage was not stated.

The total shipments reported amount to 2,537,622 tons, valued at $14,170,239.

According to the reports of the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal Co., the average annual shipments through the canal for the last five years have been 716,644 tons, for which the tolls have averaged $163,151.33, or a general average of 22¾ cents per ton. Applying this general rate to the traffic reported as now existing and ready to use a free canal, we find that a free canal would produce a saving on tolls not less than $577,309 per year. In addition to the saving on tolls, a further saving of 21¾ cents per ton on the general run of freight is estimated as probable, due to the cheap transportation expected to develop over a free route. The saving from this cause would be not less than $551,933 per year.

It should be noted that the figures given above are only partial, and may be taken as conservative and well below the actually existing amount of commerce.

Without considering the saving in insurance, the annual saving on known existing coastwise commerce which would use a free canal may be stated as not less than $1,229,242. The actual saving on all coastwise commerce which would use the canal, including that commerce now existing but not reported, would probably be considerably in excess of this amount.

The same report also shows the probable value of this canal as a means of avoiding marine disasters in the Atlantic Ocean. This report states that—

During the last five years many vessels and lives have been lost along the coast between Cape Charles and Cape Henlopen, between which points there is no harbor of refuge except the inadequate one at Chincoteague. Among the vessels so lost were 32 engaged in the coastwise trade which might have used the canal, if the same had been available and free, and which would in that way have avoided the dangers which caused their loss. The value of these vessels and their cargoes is not known, but the aggregate tonnage was about 22,000, and it may be assumed that there was lost with them not less than 12,000 tons of freight. Vessels of this class generally carry all that can be loaded upon them and the above assumption is conservative.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROCKSON. I have not the time.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to direct a very pertinent inquiry. The gentleman has stated that the States of Pennsylvania, Delaware, and New Jersey own stock in this private corporation that operates the canal. Can the gentleman inform the committee whether it is proposed that the States shall donate their stock in the canal to the Government if the Government purchases the canal at the amount carried in the bill?

Mr. BROCKSON. I am not informed as to that.

Allowing 50 per cent of the cost of new vessels of the sizes reported, their value may be assumed as $450,000. Considering the total tonnage and value of all freight reported to the board as shipped along the route of the canal, an average of $4.81 per ton has been deduced for the general run of coastwise freight. The cargoes lost may then be assumed to be worth not less than $57,720, and the value of the canal as a preventive of marine disaster may be taken as not less than $100,000 per year, in addition to which must be considered the great reduction in insurance rates on the total volume of coastwise traffic now running outside the Capes, but ready to change to the canal when possible. There are no statistics available from which the amount of this saving may be obtained. With the 32 vessels mentioned above were lost 49 lives, an average of about 10 per year.

Such loss of life and property could practically all be avoided by the enlargement of this canal so that all the commerce of that locality could pass through the canal.

Notwithstanding the size of this canal and the toll charges, it has been and is now of great value to the people along the Atlantic coast in keeping down the freight rates. In addition to the great commerce moved through this canal a regular line of passenger boats, a day line and a night line, run between Philadelphia and Baltimore, carrying on an average about 80,000 passengers per year.

Cheaper transportation is one of the great needs of this country. The improvement of our waterways is the surest means to that end. With a small capital of about $50,000, a man can purchase a tugboat and barges and carry freight in competition with the railroad companies that must have millions of dollars to construct and maintain their roads and equipment.

The purchase and enlargement of the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal will be money well and profitably spent for the people.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 12 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, does the gentleman expect to use those 12 minutes to-night?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes. The gentleman from Texas said he wanted 10 minutes, and I thought I would reserve 2 minutes for myself.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, the arguments made in reference to what the savings will be should sections of this intracoastal canal be dug are on a par with statements just made by the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. BROCKSON], who gave the number of deaths that occurred along the eastern coast and then made the statement following that that if this segment of the canal was dug it would save all of those lives and all that loss on the eastern coast, when it could not possibly affect but one section of the eastern coast, and that would be from the mouth of the Chesapeake Bay to the mouth of the Delaware Bay, which would be about 100 miles. It has always been my understanding that the most dangerous part of that coast was around Cape Hatteras; and it is furthermore shown by the figures that two-thirds of the deaths and two-thirds of the loss to property occur inside these harbors and inside the very waterways they propose to traverse by this intracoastal waterway.

Mr. BROCKSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALLAWAY. Yes.

Mr. BROCKSON. I mentioned no deaths except those which occurred between Cape Henlopen and Cape Charles; that is, between the Chesapeake and the Delaware.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I think this matter is important enough to be properly discussed before a full committee, and I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Eighty-two Members present, not a quorum.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ALEXANDER, Chairman of the Committee

SENATE.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we turn our faces day by day to Thee, who art the author of every good and perfect gift. Thou dost not withhold Thy blessing from us when we cease to ask Thee. Thou dost care for us even though we are wayward and forgetful of Thy goodness and careless of Thy love for us. We must receive Thy blessing blindly if we do not recognize Thy love and care. We would with open vision behold the hand that gives to us the blessings of life. Such a vision will multiply the joy of receiving and give to us also the power of giving back to Thee a glad response of love and gratitude for Thy love and kindness to us.

Give us the ministry of Thy grace this day that we may discharge every duty according to Thy will, that we may hold ever as the supreme privilege of life our right to love Thee in return for Thy goodness to us. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last when, on request of Mr. SMOOT and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read the letter.

The Secretary read as follows:

CITIZENS' COMMITTEE,
29 Broadway, New York, March 20, 1914.

Hon. JAMES H. BRADY,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We have the honor to forward you copy of resolutions protesting against repeal of the free-tolls provision of the Panama Canal act, which were passed at a great meeting of citizens at Carnegie Hall to-night.

We ask your earnest consideration of this protest and hope you will vote against repeal of the free-tolls provision.

Very respectfully,

SAML. SEABURY,
Chairman of Meeting.
H. C. STIMPSON,
Secretary, 29 Broadway, New York City.

Mr. BRADY. I ask that the resolutions accompanying the letter may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolutions adopted at meeting of citizens in Carnegie Hall, New York, on Friday evening, March 20, 1914.

Whereas the Panama Canal has been built upon American soil by American energy and paid for by the money of the American taxpayer, and is therefore an American waterway; and

Whereas this waterway is subject exclusively to the sovereignty and jurisdiction of the United States, and the American Congress has provided that it shall be open to the commerce of the world upon fair and reasonable terms, and has exempted from tolls American coastwise trade, with which, under existing laws, foreign nations can not compete; and

Whereas Great Britain has demanded the repeal of this law which involves solely a regulation of domestic commerce and bases its demands upon the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, notwithstanding the facts that that treaty was made on the understanding that the canal should be built in territory alien to the United States, and that since that time the United Staes has acquired by purchase from the Republic of Panama the rights of sovereignty over the territory through which the canal has been constructed; and

Whereas the British claim, if recognized, involves, not only the surrender by the United States of sovereignty over its own territory and of the right to regulate its own domestic commerce but also the assertion of an anglo-American control over the canal; and

Whereas the present administration at Washington has refused to maintain the American right and has constituted itself the champion of the British claim as set forth in the protest of Sir Edward Grey, and advocates the complete repudiation of the attitude assumed by the last administration in reference to the canal: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we, citizens of New York, in mass meeting assembled in Carnegie Hall, this 20th day of March, 1914, denounce the proposal to repeal the free-tolls provision in the Panama Canal act in compliance with the demand or protest of any foreign power as an unjustifiable surrender of American rights in the Panama Canal and an unwarranted abdication of American sovereignty over American territory;

Resolved, That we denounce it as a breach of the Monroe doctrine, carrying with it by implication the recognition of the British claim that the canal is an international body of water and not an American waterway, and the admission that it should in the future be subject to anglo-American control;

Resolved, That we denounce as intolerable to patriotic American citizens the attitude or suggestion that the exemption of coastwise trade is anything but a regulation of domestic commerce, or that the policy to be adopted in reference to such commerce should be determined or affected by any power but the United States alone;

Resolved, That we commend the course of the Hon. JAMES A. O'GORMAN, United States Senator from New York, and the other Senators and Representatives who have courageously opposed the proposed repeal, and commend them for placing loyalty to their country above obedience to party leaders who, although acting contrary to the platform of their party, now seek to coerce the legislative branch of the Government into a surrender of American rights;

Resolved, That we call upon the Representatives from the State of New York, regardless of party divisions, to stand by the exclusive right of the American people and the American Government to decide for themselves a question that vitally affects the commercial interests of this chief American port;

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to each House of Congress and to the President: And, finally, be it

Resolved, That we call upon the Congress of the United States to repudiate decisively these insolent demands of a foreign power and to stand like adamant against all attempts thus to surrender the vital interests of our country, whether these attempts be made by another branch of the Government, betrayed into panic by cleverly inspired fears of imaginary dangers, or suggested by those whose snobbish subserviency to certain foreign opinion makes them, as it made the Tories of the days of the Revolution and as it makes the ambassador of to-day, look upon English claims as superior to American rights, and who seek in every controversy that arises between the two countries to serve England by the betrayal of America.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The letter and accompanying resolutions will be referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

Mr. GRONNA. I have here a petition, signed very numerously by citizens of my State, asking for some legislation in regard to rural credit. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD without reading, omitting the signatures.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, omitting the signatures, as follows:

To the Hon. A. J. GRONNA, Hon. P. J. MCCUMBER, Hon. GEORGE M. YOUNG, Hon. P. D. NORTON, and Hon. H. T. HELGESEN:

We, the undersigned farmers and taxpayers of Morton County, N. Dak., recognizing that the question of rural credit is one of most vital importance to the future success of the rural communities of the United States, and being heartily in favor of legislation by Congress that will relieve the pressing situation that now confronts the average farmer with reference to obtaining money for the purpose of carrying on farming operations, respectfully petition you to use your utmost efforts to cause a passage of House bill No. 11897, known as the Bathrick bill, which particular bill we have studied and are familiar with, and which bill has the approval of the "Grange" or "Patrons of Husbandry of the United States," and we believe that this particular bill comes nearer offering the relief needed than any of the other bills proposed.

Mr. GRONNA presented a memorial of the Fargo and Moorhead Builders' Council and the Builders and Traders' Exchange of Fargo, N. Dak., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to make lawful certain agreements between employees and laborers and persons engaged in agriculture or horticulture, etc., which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present two letters from business firms in my State, relative to the proposed increased rates on magazines, books, and catalogues. I ask that the letters may be printed in the RECORD, and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

There being no objection, the letters were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHICAGO, ILL., March 18, 1914.

Senator L. Y. SHERMAN,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We wish to enter our protest against the proposed increase on magazines and trade papers which at present enjoy the second-class mail privileges.

We believe that if this increase is put into effect it will greatly damage the publications, and quite naturally the printing business will suffer.

We trust that you may see your way clear to use your influence against this increase of postal rates on publications.

Very truly, yours,

COZZENS & BEATON,
By L. M. COZZENS.

ROCKFORD, ILL., March 16, 1914.

Senator L. Y. SHERMAN,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Please take note that the new rates on catalogues and books went into effect to-day, and this is the way it affects our concern, which is only one of thousands trying their best to sell their goods throughout the United States by the aid of catalogues:

Up to the present time we could send our catalogue, which weighs 9 ounces, to any part of the United States or its possessions for 5 cents. Beginning to-day, we are obliged to pay 11 cents to send this catalogue to California that we may solicit trade, and at the same time it costs us only 5 cents to send the catalogue and solicit trade in Indiana. It will cost us 12 cents to solicit trade in the Philippine Islands, where before it cost us only 5 cents.

Now, we do not understand why, as plain business men, the Government of this country should impose any such unfair tax on us, namely, as to discourage our soliciting business in one part of the United States against another part. We believe that the fair and square way is for the Government to assist the manufacturer in getting or soliciting all the business that he can possibly get, and not to throw any such handicaps as the present rates on catalogues referred to.

Now, there is another thing to consider which the Representative or Congressman does not have in view, namely, in a manufacturing concern the catalogues are usually posted and mailed by boys, and where the rate is the same on all catalogues it is a very easy matter to attach the postage stamps. By this new rate, however, it is necessary in the rush of the day to stop and look up the postage rate on every catalogue that goes out of the manufacturers' office, simply because this new rate calls for a different rate for every territory or zone. We must admit that some very peculiar rules and laws are being placed in effect the last few years, and it does seem as though most of them were pushed through without any consideration of the hardships imposed on the manufacturers or business men.

We, as manufacturers, have always felt that the Government of this country gave little or no assistance to the manufacturer in soliciting his export trade, but we did not think that conditions would arise whereby the Government would place handicaps on the manufacturer for soliciting his business in his own country.

We believe that the life of this country is more or less in the farmer, the manufacturer, and the laboring man, who is dependent on the manufacturer, and therefore we believe it is up to the Government of this country to look after its welfare by assisting the manufacturer in every way possible instead of placing handicaps before him continually.

We should be very pleased, indeed, to have you consider this matter of catalogue postage, and we are confident that you will hear complaints from other sources.

Awaiting further favors, we remain,
Yours, truly,

W. F. & JOHN BARNES CO.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas President Wilson is urging upon Congress the repeal of the law granting free passage through the Panama Canal to American coastwise shipping, and is urging that our domestic commerce passing through said canal be taxed the same as foreign shipping; and

Whereas the one great reason urged by the people of the Pacific coast for the construction of the canal was that it would give us competition in freight rates and relieve us from the burden we are laboring under in the matter of excessive transportation charges; and

Whereas a tax levied upon our commodities passing through the canal gives the railroads that additional advantage in rates and is, to that extent, a tax to our industries; that at the proposed rate it means 3 cents less on each box of apples, 3½ cents less on each bushel of wheat, 8 cents a thousand less on shingles, and a dollar and a half to two dollars per thousand less for our lumber, and affecting every industry in the State of Washington in proportion: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Spokane Chamber of Commerce, That in case Congress accepts the English and President Wilson's interpretation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and imposes toll charges, that, in that event, it is the duty of our Federal Congress to enact at once a law granting a subsidy to all coastwise shipping passing through the canal that will equal in amount to the toll charges, and that a sufficient amount be appropriated annually from the receipts of the canal to pay said subsidy.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That seeds, cuttings, bulbs, roots, scions, and plants shall hereafter be embraced in and carried as fourth-class matter and for the same rates of postage: Provided, That all packages thereof containing 8 ounces or less shall be charged for at the rate of 1 cent for 2 ounces or fraction thereof: Provided further, That the Postmaster General may, in his discretion, by order, fix the time within which all parcels of the fourth class shall be delivered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GALLINGER. I object to the present consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There being objection, the bill goes to the calendar.

Mr. GALLINGER subsequently said: Mr. President, I withdraw the objection I made to the consideration of the bill reported by the Senator from Alabama. I misunderstood the purport of it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. What is the bill? I ask to have it read for information.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill has been read. It relates to the sending of seeds, cuttings, and so forth, through the mail.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I have no objection.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I submit a resolution and ask to have it read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 310), as follows:

Resolved, That the Interstate Commerce Commission be, and it hereby is, directed to transmit to the Senate, from time to time as taken and transcribed, a copy of all evidence introduced and all exhibits received in evidence by said commission at hearings in the cases Docket No. 5860, entitled "Revenues of rail carriers in official classification territory," and T. and S. Docket No. 333, entitled "Rate increases in official classification territory."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not think, Mr. President, there will be any objection interposed to the present consideration of the resolution. Therefore I ask unanimous consent that it may be considered at this time.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, executive clerk, announced that the President had, on March 20, 1914, approved and signed the following act and joint resolution:

S. 746. An act for the relief of Capt. Frank Parker; and

S. J. Res. 114. Joint resolution for the appointment of a member of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution.

RADIUM-BEARING ORES.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I offer an amendment to Senate bill 4405, generally known as the radium bill, the bill to provide for and encourage the prospecting, mining, and treatment of radium-bearing ores in lands belonging to the United States, for the purpose of securing an adequate supply of radium for Government and other hospitals in the United States, and for other purposes. I ask that the proposed amendment be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the proposed amendment.

The SECRETARY. Strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and insert:

That whenever the President shall find that the supply of radium in the United States is or will become inadequate by reason of its exportation or the exportation of ores containing radium and shall make proclamation thereof, it shall be unlawful to export, except under such limitations and exceptions as the President shall prescribe, any radium or ores containing radium in sufficient quantity for extraction from any place in the United States until otherwise ordered by the President or by Congress.

SEC. 2. That any shipment of radium or ores containing radium in quantities sufficient for extraction, hereby declared unlawful after such proclamation, shall be punishable by fine not to exceed $10,000 or imprisonment not exceeding two years, or by both.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, the bill to which I have offered this amendment is pending before the Senate and likely to be taken up for consideration almost any day. I regard it as a matter of very great importance, and it is of peculiar importance to my own State, because it is said that, so far as lands have been discovered in the United States, Utah and Colorado contain the only ores carrying radium. Therefore I should like to have the permission of the Senate to say just a word at this time with reference to this amendment, so that before the bill is taken up the proposed amendment may be given such consideration by Members of the Senate as they think it warrants.

The bill which is before the Senate provides, in substance, that hereafter the United States Government shall be given the preference right to purchase all ores which may be extracted from lands located. It creates no obligation on the part of the United States to buy the ores, but compels the mining locator to sell all ores containing radium to the Government.

It further provides for an appropriation of $150,000 for the purpose of erecting and equipping a suitable building or buildings for radium extraction and a further appropriation of $300,000 for the treatment of radium-bearing ores and the extraction of radium during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915.

It will therefore be seen that this bill proposes to put the Government of the United States into the business of manufacturing radium and makes an initial appropriation of nearly half a million dollars for that purpose. Of course that means that next year it will be followed by an appropriation of perhaps a million dollars, and no one can foresee how much money will be appropriated in the future for that business.

Personally I am very much opposed to the Government of the United States going into any kind of business. I think it would be a great mistake for the Government to embark in this business. It is a business which can be carried on by private parties quite as successfully as any other business.

The principal ground, as I understand it, for the passage of the proposed bill is because the United States is unable to retain within its own borders the radium which is being extracted. It send to the desk and ask to have read a statement in the Washington Post of this morning, purporting to quote from the annual report of the Director of the Bureau of Mines upon this subject. It is very brief, and I ask to have it read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read it.

The Secretary read as follows:

Radium needs of the United States were represented yesterday in a striking manner by Joseph A. Holmes, Director of the Bureau of Mines, in his annual report. Europe is monopolizing the metal, he says, adding that there is a pitiful lack of the healing substance in American hospitals.

"It is estimated that in the United States 75,000 persons die each year from cancer," says the report. "Radium is considered the most promising cure for certain types of cancer, and in many cases where surgical operations are not practicable it is said to be the only known cure for this terrible disease. But the serious barrier to progress in demonstrating these facts is the scarcity of radium.

NOT MORE THAN 2 GRAMS IN THE UNITED STATES.

"There is probably not more than 30 grams (about 1 ounce) of radium now available for use in such treatment in all countries. Of this amount there is probably not more than 2 grams of radium bromide in the United States, and this is in the hands of a few surgeons. Probably 15 grams of radium bromide was produced during 1912; and of this 15 grams nearly 11.5 grams was extracted in various European countries from ores shipped from the United States—mainly from Colorado and Utah.

"Meanwhile, American hospitals are vainly endeavoring to purchase and bring back to the United States for their own use some small part of this radium, even at such prices as $120,000 to $160,000 per gram.

ALL GOVERNMENTS RETAINING IT.

"The fact that thus far the United States has been able to obtain not more than 2 grams of radium is due to the fact that in Europe all the governments and speculative agencies are endeavoring to procure and retain supplies of radium, and the American people are only now awakening to realization of this fact."

Mr. Holmes describes the work of the Government radium laboratory at Denver, where the bureau is attempting to develop processes for extracting the metal from its ores economically.

"The investigation has been delayed," says his report, "because nearly all radium-bearing ores mined in this country have for several years been shipped to various European countries and there treated by secret processes, not only for their radium, but also for their vanadium and uranium contents."

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I do not, of course, intend or desire to enter upon any discussion of the policy of this bill at this time. I simply content myself by calling the attention of the Senate to its revolutionary character. I think it is an exceedingly unfortunate tendency of the Government of the United States, of which this is one manifestation, of going into private business. The evil which this bill seeks to remedy is one which can be reached in, perhaps, not a usual but a perfectly legal way, by prohibiting the exportation of radium and the ores containing radium from the United States. That that is a power which belongs to the Congress of the United States, and a power which by Congress may be delegated to the President of the United States, I think there can be no doubt.

One of the earliest examples which we have in history of the exercise of this power, so far as I am informed, was the act of the British Parliament as far back as 1766, when, in apprehension of famine, an act was passed which, in effect, prohibited the exportation of corn from Great Britain. We have invoked the same principle within recent years when we have authorized the President of the United States to forbid the exportation of coal or of arms or other munitions of war, not because we were engaged in war, but for a purpose entirely outside of that—because we did not desire that these munitions should be used in certain conflicts beyond our borders. There are ample precedents for this sort of legislation, and it seems to me that the amendment I have proposed would cover all the evils which we seek to remedy without committing the United States to a policy which I think is a mistaken one.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I am very much pleased indeed that the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] has this morning invited the attention of the Senate to this bill. It was my purpose to give notice—and I now give notice—that at the conclusion of the morning business on to-morrow I shall ask the Senate to take up the bill for consideration, and I express the fervent hope that unanimous consent will be given for the consideration of the bill.

Everybody recognizes the urgency of the necessity for legislation on this matter. The Senator from Utah, who has just addressed the Senate, evidencing his opposition to the bill reported by the committee, proposes a substitute for it which could only be considered in a case of dire emergency. It is suggested by him that the legislation proposed by the committee is revolutionary in character, and possibly it may be justly so characterized. He proposes, upon his side, however, legislation which, if it is not altogether without precedent, is equally revolutionary in character; that is to say, he proposes instead that the export of ores containing radium be absolutely prohibited. It is not the time now to discuss the merits of these matters. As indicating the necessity for urgency of legislation, however, let me remark that information has come to me within the last day or two that in the county of San Juan, in the State represented by the distinguished Senator who has just now addressed the Senate, there were 142 locations of land containing radium-bearing ores made since the 1st of January last. It is perfectly obvious that the probability of the value and price of this commodity rising in the future has induced a perfect race for the location of the remainder of the public lands that contain deposits of radium-bearing ores. It is for that reason that I think the remedy suggested by the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah does not meet the requirements of the case. The absorption would go on just exactly the same under the legislation which is proposed by him.

The legislation proposed by the committee is for the purpose of preventing the further appropriation of radium-bearing lands by the interests whose attention has thus far been directed to them. As illustrative of that activity and as indicating the necessity for speedy action, I might here say that a single corporation engaged in the business of extracting radium from ores, whose place of business is in the city of Pittsburgh, is now the owner of something like 150 of these claims. Another organization is the owner of 80 of these claims. Out with us in the mining country it is a rather extraordinary condition of affairs when a single company acquires so many claims as that of even the more abundant minerals, such as gold and silver and copper and lead bearing ores.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Will the Senator allow a question for the information of the RECORD?

Mr. WALSH. I shall be very glad to do so.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I will ask how many acres are included in one of these claims to which the Senator from Montana refers?

Mr. WALSH. Generally the acreage is 20, and as, according to the best information we have, about 1,000 locations have been made, that would signify the appropriation of about 20,000 acres. Of course, it is open to question as to whether many of these claims will be found to be productive in commercial quantities.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator will permit me to say at that point that under the mining laws of the United States it will be necessary that at least $100 worth of work shall be done upon each one of these claims every year; so that, unless they are productive, they will probably go back to the public domain in a short time.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, that is the case. As to how many of them will justify the continuous expenditure of money for work, the committee has no information. Anyway, I trust that we shall have an opportunity to present this matter to the consideration of the Senate for action to-morrow.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that in the State of Colorado, according to the testimony that is before the committee, there is a strip of ground 5 miles wide and 150 miles long that is said to contain radium-bearing ores upon which locations can be and have been made.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I do not desire to allow the statement of the Senator from Colorado just made to go without a word of explanation. The testimony given before the committee was not that there is an area 150 miles long and from 5 to 25 miles wide that produces radium-bearing ores, but simply that discoveries have been made within an area having such bounds as those, and that within that area the number of claims which I have indicated have been located. One would get an entirely erroneous idea if he reached the conclusion that there was an area of radium-bearing ores of any such extent as that.

MINING ON THE PUBLIC DOMAIN.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a motion in the nature of a resolution, coming over from a preceding day. It will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Motion of the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] that the Committee on Mines and Mining be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 4898) to encourage and promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, potassium, and sodium on the public domain, and that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I ask that the motion may go over without prejudice and remain on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. SMOOT. What is the request?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The request is that the motion may go over without prejudice.

Mr. MYERS. Until to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the motion will go over without prejudice.

The morning business is closed, and the calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS—PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, I rise to a question of personal privilege. I present a statement signed by four residents of New Orleans as a "committee of arrangements," purporting to represent the sentiments of a meeting of Irish-American citizens assembled in the city of New Orleans on the 17th of March, and sent to the Louisiana delegation in Congress for insertion in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

I ask for its insertion therein and that it be read to the Senate by the Secretary, requesting that he will place particular emphasis on that part of the document commenting on myself, and after the reading I desire to offer some remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

NEW ORLEANS, LA., March 17, 1914.

We, citizens of New Orleans, La., of Irish birth or descent, assembled to honor the memory of St. Patrick, the great apostle of Ireland, proclaim anew our allegiance to this great Republic, in which so many millions of our race have found a home and to which they have given loyal and unstinted service from the revolutionary to the present day, watering its battle fields with their blood and contributing their full share to the building up of the strength and prosperity which have made it to-day the mightiest power on earth.

We have earned the right to full citizenship given us by the law of the land, and which has ever been exercised unselfishly for the welfare and glory of the United States and the promotion and extension of the principles of government established by the fathers of the Republic.

We resent and repel the attempt of a section of the daily press, inspired by foreign influence and acting for English interest, to restrict and limit the exercise of our citizenship to the mere act of voting and to misrepresent our motives to our fellow citizens.

In civil life as well as in war our race has done its full duty to the United States, and never has that duty been more loyally performed than in our warnings, based on our better, more intimate, and more recent knowledge of English methods, against the insidious wiles of British diplomacy, which seeks under the mask of peace to entangle our Government in the quarrels and rivalries of the Old World.

We congratulate Senator O'GORMAN on his timely and truthful exposure of the real purpose of Andrew Carnegie-Anglo-American alliance and the incorporation of the United States in the British Empire, and we denounce as un-American and unpatriotic the attacks made on him by the New York papers, the World, the Evening Post, and the Times. Unable to controvert his unanswerable statements of facts, these papers, which always take sides against the United States—our Daily Picayune among them—in every controversy with England, were obliged to fall back on misrepresentation and imputation of unworthy motives, which were offensive to the whole body of Irish citizenship.

We protest against the appropriation by Congress or by our city or State government of any public money for the so-called "One hundred years of peace celebration" as improper and unfair to those countries of Europe which were uniformly friendly to this Republic when England was bitterly hostile and plotting its disruption. We protest against the repeal of the free-toll provision of the Panama Canal act at the dictation of England. We affirm that the free-tolls provision does not violate the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and that England, having openly broken the Clayton-Bulwer treaty by annexing the Belize territory, is not in a position to charge the United States with a breach of national honor. She is now attempting to dictate the terms on which American ships are to compete with hers in an American waterway built with American money. That we have nothing but praise for the manly stand taken by Senator RANSDELL in this matter, also pity and contempt for the other Senator now misrepresenting Louisiana in the Senate of the United States, who is willing to stultify himself, sacrifice the interest of this country, and especially the interest of this State and city, simply because President Wilson told him it would help him in its foreign policy, although the foreign policy should have nothing to do with deciding a question of right or wrong. Any American schoolboy would be ashamed of being buncoed in that way. THORNTON says he honestly voted for the free-tolls provision; that he still thinks it does not violate the Hay-Pauncefote treaty; that Congress has the right to exempt American shipping from the payment of tolls; yet he has not the manliness to stand up as a true American would do for the right, no matter the consequence.

We submit that 13,000,000 citizens at the last presidential election voted for free tolls—6,292,718 Democrats, 4,057,429 Progressives—have free tolls in their platform; and while not in the Republican platform, which was silent on this question, its candidate approved same and received 3,399,221 votes. We also submit that the passing of our ships free would give them a chance to compete with subsidized ships of England, placing them on an equal footing. That to say the American people did not know what they were voting for was to charge them with ignorance. That the betrayal of party platforms, whether by President, Senators, or Congressmen, leads to unrest and the increase of the Socialist Party. That the Irish people are right in their warnings to the American people as to the dangerous purpose of the Carnegie Foundation, as is proved by the testimony of its secretary before the Senate committee, that immense sums of money are being used by it to influence legislation; and we demand that the investigation be complete, to the end that the facts be proved or not whether this money is being used for treasonable purposes, and if so same be seized and confiscated by the Government and those engaged therein be prosecuted to the full extent of the law.

We demand that Senator ROOT be compelled to explain the abuse of his franking privileges.

Resolved, That copies of this declaration be sent to our Representatives from Louisiana in both Houses of Congress for representation to have same printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

HON. JOHN FITZPATRICK,
JOHN J. O'NEILL,
J. HARRY FARR,
FRANK H. KILLEEN,
Committee of Arrangements.

A true copy.

E. F. FOLEY.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, I can not properly characterize this attack on myself by any other expression than that of scurrilous.

I do not believe this "declaration," as it is called in the closing paragraph, was passed on or even submitted to a public meeting of the Irish-American citizens of New Orleans.

None of the papers of that city containing accounts of the celebration of St. Patrick's day on March 17 published it or alluded to it.

I do not know any of the parties whose names are affixed to this "declaration" except Capt. John Fitzpatrick, and my intimate acquaintance of many years with him justifies me in saying that unless he tells me so I shall not believe that he signed a statement referring to me in such scurrilous language.

Without any personal knowledge on the subject or without any information from any source concerning it, it is my belief that this document was prepared by one man, or possibly by two or three men, whose judgment, in view of the remarkable language used with reference to myself, I charitably conclude must have been blinded by their inherited dislike for England, possibly stimulated at the time by a state of spiritual exaltation.

About two years ago, when the question of passing or renewing an arbitration treaty with Great Britain was before the Senate, I declared I would not vote for it in that shape, because it might require the submission to arbitration of a question involving the national honor of the United States.

I was not influenced in the matter by any feeling of prejudice against England, and I would have taken the same position if the treaty had been with any other country.

Shortly afterwards I received copies of resolutions from various Irish-American societies of several cities, including New Orleans, warmly commending my attitude.

I felt morally sure that, while these societies had the honor of the American Nation at heart as much as myself, they were also largely influenced by their dislike of England.

But now, when in accordance with what I conceive to be the best interest generally of my country I am willing to vote on a question in a way they think would be pleasing to England, the parties signing this "declaration" revile me as one who is willing to sacrifice the interest of his State and country instead of standing up for them as any true American would do.

Again, I feel morally sure that a large factor in determining the position of these parties against me is their dislike of England.

I am not standing here to deny the right of Irish-Americans to resent the treatment of Ireland by England in the past, as disclosed by the light of history, but I think it unfortunate that such a consideration should influence the judgment of these citizens in the determination of present American public questions, and still more unfortunate that they should impute improper motives to other citizens acting in the discharge of their civic duty because the ideas of these other citizens may not accord with their own.

I certainly do not decry the loyalty of our Irish-American citizens to our common country, nor the fact that they have greatly contributed to its advancement by their course in both war and peace; and assuredly I could have no personal prejudice against the descendants of a race whose blood flows in the veins of my children on their mother's side, and in honor of whose patron saint no member of my family, wherever they were, have failed for the last 25 years nearly to wear the green on the 17th of March.

Nor would I think of denying that all of them who are American citizens, no matter how short the period since they or their ancestors came to this country, have the same rights in every respect as American citizens to assist in the determination of American questions that I have.

But I deny their right to assume, as the signers of this "declaration" assume, that they are better or more loyal and patriotic Americans than I am.

In the light of facts it is fair to presume that I have as much right to be as proud of the honor of my country and as zealous in maintaining it as themselves, considering that my ancestors in both paternal and maternal lines settled in it prior to 1670, and that my ancestors played no small part in throwing off the yoke of England during the war for American independence, when the ancestors of nine-tenths of them were still in Ireland.

I very frankly admit that I am glad when my course on public matters meets with the approval of any considerable number of Americans, whether or not they are foreign born or the descendants of foreign-born ancestors, but I do not admit their right to abuse me because I do not see matters from their viewpoint.

And I shall vote on all questions pertaining to the public welfare according to the dictates of my own conscience, and if at any time it seems to me that the public welfare can be subserved by a reversal of a position I took at some previous time I shall not be ashamed nor afraid to change.

As for the charge in this "declaration" that by my change I am sacrificing the interest of my State or of its principal city, it is sufficient to say I do not believe it, nor do I believe that any considerable number of the citizens of Louisiana so think.

And, at any rate, it is to the great mass of the voters of Louisiana that I am responsible for my official conduct and not to any subdivision of it.

JAMES F. SELLERS.

Mr. THOMAS obtained the floor.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, on Saturday I asked and obtained unanimous consent for the consideration of Senate resolution 278. It was postponed on account of the absence of the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]. I now, through the indulgence of the Senator from Colorado, ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. THOMAS. I yield with the understanding that this is a matter which will not provoke any great amount of controversy or take much time.

Mr. OLIVER. If it leads to debate, I will withdraw the request.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, resumed the consideration of the resolution (S. Res. 278) reported by Mr. WILLIAMS from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate on the 6th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to appoint James F. Sellers an additional messenger, who shall be paid at the rate of $1,200 per annum from the contingent fund of the Senate, upon vouchers to be approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, until otherwise provided for by law.

Mr. OLIVER. I move to strike out "$1,200" and insert "$1,050," the amount Mr. Sellers is now receiving.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I do not wish to take up much of the time of the Senate; but as this matter was discussed the other day while I was out, and as the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] referred to the fact that the expenses paid from the contingent fund had increased by $50,000, I desire to call attention to the fact that the Senate, from February 9, 1910, to March 13, 1914, has made appropriations of $163,514.72 for investigating committees. I shall not refer in detail to those until I come to some of the more recent ones.

We have tried, upon the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses, to hold down——

Mr. THOMAS. I should like to inquire how long it will take the Senator to make this statement.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not think it will take very long. Unanimous consent has been given for the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. THOMAS. I yielded the floor only with the understanding that this matter would not take any great amount of time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not think it will take very much time; but I do want to call attention to the expenditures beginning on page 3 of the statement, the entire body of which I will ask to have published.

In the first place, the Committee on Education and Labor spent $7,937 and some cents, in round numbers $8,000, upon an investigation of the strike in the Paint Creek coal fields of West Virginia. The Committee on the Judiciary, investigating the charge of lobbying, spent $10,159.83. The Committee on Foreign Relations, investigating the fomenting disorders in Mexico under resolution of July 26, 1912, spent $7,442. The expenses of the Committee on Military Affairs, investigating the soldiers' home at Los Angeles, Cal., were $3,374.

The expenses of some other committees I will not call attention to now because I do not want to take up the time that has been agreed to be given to the Senator from Colorado, but I wish to say that for this Congress alone the entire increase, with the exception of two or three thousand dollars, has been from these investigating committees. I wish to add that after the investigating committees are seemingly through with the work, for which they have been provided extra help, very frequently the employees continue upon the roll in spite of all that I can do or say.

I ask that this list may be inserted in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yesterday the Senator said something about a precedent for this resolution. Of course, we can not put anyone permanently upon the roll, but the resolution provides that this man shall be paid out of the contingent expenses of the Senate, and therefore it had to go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. The resolution reads that he shall continue "until otherwise provided for by law." Then the matter will go to the Committee on Rules otherwise to provide by law. This resolution was taken from page 4501 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Fifty-fifth Congress, April 28, 1898, volume 28, part 5. By consulting that reference the Senator will see that the following resolution was up for consideration:

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to appoint C. F. Lynch a messenger, who shall be paid at the rate of $1,440 per annum from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers to be approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, until otherwise provided for by law.

So it is identical in language. Mr. Jones, of Nevada, submitted that resolution. Mr. Faulkner and he had a discussion over it, and the resolution was held to be in order, and was passed by the Senate by unanimous consent.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. OVERMAN. Is the resolution up?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. THOMAS. If this matter is going to be discussed or to take further time, I must decline to yield.

Mr. OLIVER. I agreed with the Senator from Colorado that I would not press it if it should lead to discussion.

Mr. OVERMAN. It is bound to lead to discussion on account of the principle involved in it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It can not lead to much discussion.

Mr. OLIVER. I suggest that we allow this justice to be done this man, and then that the discussion take place on the construction of the rule at another time. I do not understand that there is any objection to the resolution, and I hope he will not be butchered in the house of his friends.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I must decline to yield.

Mr. OVERMAN. Was not unanimous consent given for the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. THOMAS. With the understanding that it would lead to no debate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; it was not taken up by unanimous consent. It was taken up by the grace and favor of the Senator from Colorado, who announced that if it would lead to debate he would resume the floor.

Mr. OVERMAN. Before——

Mr. OLIVER. I object to the further consideration of the resolution; because I agreed with the Senator from Colorado that it would not lead to discussion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Colorado has the floor.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I suggest that, immediately after the Senator from Colorado gets through, the Senator from Pennsylvania ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the resolution.

IRRIGATION IN COLORADO.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I ask the Secretary to read Senate joint resolution 117.

The Secretary read Senate joint resolution 117, introduced by Mr. THOMAS on the 3d instant, as follows:

Joint resolution to determine the rights of the State of Colorado and of its citizens in the beneficial uses of waters of the Rio Grande and its tributaries within the boundaries of Colorado.

Whereas the constitution of the State of Colorado provides that the water of every natural stream not theretofore appropriated is the property of the public dedicated to the use of the people of the State, and that the right to divert such waters to beneficial uses shall never be denied; and

Whereas this dedication and ownership was confirmed by the Federal Government when it admitted the State into the Union, on the 1st day of August, A. D. 1876; and

Whereas the Rio Grande and many of its tributaries have their sources in the mountains of that State, whose waters are needed and can be utilized for the reclamation of more than 1,250,000 acres of land within its boundaries, which without such waters must remain arid and unproductive; and

Whereas the Secretary of the Interior, on December 5, 1896, in disregard of this vested right and without notice to the State of Colorado, directed the Commissioner of the General Land Office to suspend action on any and all rights of way through public lands for purpose of irrigation by using the waters of the Rio Grande or any of its tributaries in the State of Colorado until further instructed by that department, which order has since been and is now in force, by reason whereof the citizens of the State have been unlawfully prohibited from appropriating said waters and applying them to beneficial uses, to the great and lasting injury of the Commonwealth; and

Whereas since said departmental order became effective many efforts to so appropriate portions of said waters by compliance with the requirements of the State and Federal statutes relating thereto have been made and defeated by the refusal of the Interior Department to approve and file the maps, plats, and description thereof; and

Whereas all efforts to secure the rescision of said order or a judicial determination of the rights of those directly interested in the use of said waters have been unavailing through inability to bring suit against the Federal authorities for such purpose without their consent: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That authority is hereby conferred upon the State of Colorado in its own right and name, or in the right and name of any citizen or citizens directly interested, or both, as it may be advised, to institute and prosecute such action at law or in equity against the Secretary of the Interior or the Commissioner of the General Land Office, or both, as it may be advised is necessary or expedient to determine its right and the right of its citizens to appropriate and apply to beneficial uses the waters of the Rio Grande and its tributaries within its geographical boundaries. Such action may be instituted in any district court of the United States, and any judgment or decree therein shall be subject to review by writ of error or appeal, as provided by law in other cases.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, a treaty between the Republics of the United States and Mexico was signed at the city of Washington on the 21st day of May, 1906. It was ratified by the Senate on the 26th day of June thereafter, by the President on the 26th day of December, 1906, and by Mexico on the 5th day of January, 1907, and proclaimed on the 16th day of that month, since which time it has been part of the supreme law of the land. It is entitled a convention between the United States and Mexico "providing for the equitable distribution of the waters of the Rio Grande for irrigation purposes."

Presumably this treaty was the result of a convention between the two Governments providing for the equitable distribution of the waters of the Rio Grande for irrigation purposes, to remove all causes of controversy between them in respect thereto, and was prompted, ostensibly at least, by considerations of international comity.

Under the provisions of this treaty the United States bound itself, after the completion of the proposed storage dam near Engle, in New Mexico, and the distributing system auxiliary thereto, and as soon as water should be available in that system for the purpose, to deliver to Mexico a total of 60,000 acre-feet of water annually in the bed of the Rio Grande at the point where the head works of the Acequia Madre, known as the Old Mexican Canal, now exist, above the city of Juarez, Mexico.

The third article stipulates that "the said delivery shall be made without cost to Mexico, and the United States agrees to pay the whole cost of storing the said quantity of water to be delivered to Mexico, of conveying the same to the international line, of measuring the said water, and of delivering it in the river bed above the head of the Mexican canal," it being understood "that the United States assumes no obligation beyond the delivering of the water in the bed of the river above the head of the Mexican Canal."

The treaty then declares, in substance, that this delivery of water is not to be construed as a recognition by the United States of any claim on the part of Mexico to the said waters, and it is agreed that in consideration of such delivery of water Mexico waives any and all such claims, for any purpose, between the head of the so-called Mexican Canal and Fort Quitman, Tex., and also declares fully settled and disposed of, and hereby waives, all claims heretofore asserted or existing or that may hereafter arise or be asserted against the United States on account of any damages alleged to have been sustained by the owners of land in Mexico by reason of the diversion by citizens of the United States of waters of the Rio Grande.

It also is recited, in substance, that the United States in entering into the treaty does not concede, either expressly or by implication, any legal basis for the claims heretofore asserted or which may hereafter be asserted, and the final understanding of the parties is that the arrangement contemplated by the treaty extends only to the portion of the Rio Grande which forms the international boundary, from the head of the Mexican Canal down to Fort Quitman, Tex., and in no other case.

Now, Mr. President, that treaty upon its face is an ordinary engagement between two sovereign powers, one of which engages to settle certain controverted local matters between them by furnishing and delivering at its own expense for all time 60,000 acre-feet of water to the other. It is, in fact, the consummation, Mr. President, of a sordid, shameful, and successful intrigue, conducted in the interests of private parties impelled by greed and gain, based upon the existence of no legal, equitable, or moral claim whatever on the part of the Mexican Government or any of its citizens against this Government or any of its citizens.

It also means, Mr. President, that this country has thereby engaged itself absolutely to expend the sum of not less than $10,000,000 of the people's money, taken, in the first instance, with the exception of $1,000,000 appropriated in 1908, from the reclamation fund, for the building of a dam which provides a reservoir of 2,760,000 acre-feet capacity, 115 miles from the head of this old Mexican ditch, to which the water is to be conveyed by an expensive system of canals through an arid territory.

This Government, because of this treaty, has also assumed to recognize and will repay to the Rio Grande Dam & Irrigation Co. the moneys which it expended in the partial construction of a dam and reservoir at the same place, the right to complete which was finally determined adversely to the company at the suit of the United States.

But, Mr. President, if this were the only loss resulting from the consummation of this treaty, great as it is, I should perhaps not have been impelled to introduce this joint resolution and expose some of the transactions which attended its construction and final adoption.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. THOMAS. I do.

Mr. BORAH. I wish to ask the Senator what is the status of that treaty now? Has it been ratified and has the interchange taken place?

Mr. THOMAS. The treaty was ratified and exchanges took place on the 16th day of January, 1907.

Mr. BORAH. Do I understand that the $10,000,000 to which the Senator refers is to be taken out of the reclamation fund?

Mr. THOMAS. Nine-tenths of it. I shall come to that in the course of my discussion of the joint resolution. But this sum, large as it is, does not amount to a tithe of the injury directly inflicted upon the States of Colorado and New Mexico through the interdict that has been laid upon their citizens by this treaty, through the departmental order of the 5th day of December, 1896, which forbids them to appropriate and acquire the waters of the Rio Grande and its tributaries in these States for power and agricultural purposes.

These, Mr. President, entail a loss which must be figured in scores of millions both present and prospective, and the pitiful part of it is that this inhibition was wholly unnecessary to the purposes sought to be subserved by this treaty, which assumes the transportation without loss of nearly 3,000,000 acre-feet of water from the State of Colorado to a reservoir 115 miles north of the Mexican border.

Mr. President, I am anxious, if possible, to rectify, in part at least, this unfortunate condition without at this time attacking the treaty or in any wise interfering with the accomplishment of its ends and aims. I therefore invoke the attention of the Senate to this joint resolution, to the conditions and circumstances which led to and attended the making of the treaty, and to its specific effect upon the growth and the civilization of two sovereign States.

Mr. President, I have referred to the fact that the treaty requires the United States to furnish annually a maximum of only 60,000 acre-feet of water to Mexico to satisfy and compromise controversies growing out of the use of waters of the Rio Grande in the United States for agricultural and other purposes.

I want to emphasize at the outset the proposition that these claims of the people of Mexico were absolutely groundless. They had no existence whatever except in the sense of injury which comes to the individual dependent upon a water supply which may occasionally fail him in whole or in part. But these conditions doubtless suggested to the fertile minds of certain individuals an opportunity to secure international action by asserting them. The lands of that section are fertile and with the assurance of water would be valuable.

These claims, Mr. President, were asserted as the outgrowth of extraordinary appropriations of water of the Rio Grande River by citizens of the United States above the point where it forms the international boundary, in consequence of which old rights of appropriation, running back to the days of the Aztecs, were alleged to have been depleted or destroyed. But it is a curious fact in the history of this affair that the claim of injurious interference with water rights on the Rio Grande was first asserted by the Republic of Mexico against this Government some 14 years after a similar claim had been made against Mexico by our State Department through the agency of the American minister at Mexico. That occurred in 1880, and is the first instance I have been able to discover where this water controversy appears in the records of the State Department.

I read from Senate Document No. 154 of the Fifty-seventh Congress, second session. In 1880, Mr. Evarts, then Secretary of State, wrote to Mr. Morgan, the United States minister to Mexico, as follows:

> I transmit herewith for your information * * * a copy of a letter of the 10th ultimo, together with its various inclosures, from the governor of the State of Texas, asking the intervention of the General Government in a matter of vital importance to the citizens of that State living on the eastern shore of the Rio Grande.
> The inclosures, as you will see, consist of the statement of the county judge of El Paso County and petitions signed by prominent citizens of San Elizario and Socorro (American towns in the El Paso Valley).
> The ground of complaint, as alleged, is that the Mexicans engaged in agricultural pursuits on the Mexican shore of the river are in the habit of diverting all of the water that comes down the river during the dry season into the ditches, thereby preventing our citizens from getting sufficient water to irrigate their crops. * * *
> I have addressed a note to the Mexican minister at this capital, requesting him to bring the matter to the attention of his Government, with a view to obtaining, if possible, alleviation from these annoyances.
> You will therefore investigate the matter as carefully and thoroughly as possible, and will report the result to the department, when, should the facts be found to bear out the allegations set forth in the inclosed correspondence, further action will be taken in the premises.

Mr. Evarts at the same time addressed a letter to the Mexican minister, in which he said:

> I have the honor to solicit your most earnest attention to a matter of vital importance to the citizens of the State of Texas engaged in agricultural pursuits on the eastern shore of the Rio Grande.

The remainder of this communication is of similar import to that addressed by the Secretary of State to our minister in Mexico, and therefore I shall not read it into the RECORD.

Just here I want to emphasize the fact, because it is of great importance in connection with the history of this treaty, that the resident Mexicans or their Government had long before this episode greatly improved their facilities for diverting the whole flow of the river during the dry season to their side of the stream by building a cement dam across the river channel above the head of the American canal, which, of course, caused the diminution of the supply to the American side and which led to the remonstrances of our Secretary of State. It is hardly necessary to add that the Mexican Government gave no heed to his protest.

Such was the condition of affairs when Col. Anson Mills entered into this situation with his proposed international dam scheme.

On page 77 of Senate Document No. 154, Col. Mills is reported to have said before the House Committee on Irrigation in 1901:

> My first acquaintance with the country on the Rio Grande * * * was in 1858, when I went there in the interest of the Memphis, El Paso & Pacific Railroad. * * * I then got into the occupation of surveying lands. * * * I lived there four years prior to the war. Since the war I served in that locality, and have been acquainted with the river ever since. * * * While on leave of absence at El Paso [1888], I was requested by some of my friends to project a remedy for the then decreasing water in the river. * * * I came to Washington and had an interview with Maj. Powell. * * * He advised me to see the Secretary of State. I went to the Secretary of State and had a verbal interview with him. * * * Later on Maj. Powell induced the Secretary of War to detail me to duty at El Paso under his instructions to make the necessary investigations to determine whether such a scheme [a storage dam at El Paso] was practicable; * * * to cultivate friendly investigations in the matter between the people of this side and the people of Mexico, so in case a dam should prove practicable I could find out whether the Mexican population would assent to it. (Testimony on bill H. R. 9710, House Committee on Foreign Affairs, 1901, pp. 221–222.)

Here, Mr. President, is the genesis of this treaty—a request on the part of some of the friends of this official to devise some method whereby the waters of this river could be more effectually utilized for the purposes of irrigation. That suggestion bore its first fruit in the concurrent resolution of 1890, the ostensible purpose of which is supposed to be embodied in its title and its substance. That resolution is found in a number of places in the report. I shall read it from page 9 of Senate Document No. 154, Fifty-seventh Congress, second session. I am told that Col. Mills was the author of this concurrent resolution. Its title is:

> Concerning the irrigation of arid lands in the valley of the Rio Grande, the construction of a dam across said river at or near El Paso, Tex., for the storage of its waste waters, and for other purposes.

The resolution is so short that I will read it into the RECORD:

> Whereas the Rio Grande is the boundary line between the United States and Mexico; and
> Whereas by means of irrigating ditches and canals taking the water from said river and other causes the usual supply of water therefrom has been exhausted before it reaches the point where it divides the United States of America from the Republic of Mexico, thereby rendering the lands in its valley arid and unproductive, to the great detriment of the citizens of the two countries who live along its course; and
> Whereas in former years annual floods—

And I want to emphasize that language—

> Whereas in former years annual floods in said river have been such as to change the channel thereof, producing serious avulsions and oftentimes and in many places leaving large tracts of land belonging to the people of the United States on the Mexican side of the river, and Mexican lands on the American side, thus producing a confusion of boundary, a disturbance of private and public titles to lands, as well as provoking conflicts of jurisdiction between the two Governments, offering facilities for smuggling, promoting the evasion and preventing the collection of revenues by the respective Governments: Therefore,
> Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President be requested, if in his opinion it is not incompatible with the public interests, to enter into negotiations with the Government of Mexico, with a view to the remedying of all such difficulties as are mentioned in the preamble to this resolution, and such other matters connected therewith as may be better adjusted by agreement or convention between the two Governments, and the President is also requested to include in the negotiations with the Government of Mexico all other subjects of interest which may be deemed to affect the present and prospective relations of both Governments.

This resolution is very general and all-embracing in its character, much more so than would be supposed from a reference to its title. It is doubly significant, Mr. President, that in 1884 a boundary treaty was ratified between the two Republics, which in 1889 was amended and enlarged, and which is still in existence, under the provisions of which Col. Mills was, in 1893, made commissioner for the United States. Ostensibly the representatives of the two Governments are charged with the duty of determining their common boundary line, which is subject to disturbances caused in flood seasons. These freshets result in avulsions of the banks, whereby bancos, as they are called, are formed, consisting of large tracts of land lying between the old and the new channel. These are claimed by both Governments, hence the treaty of 1889. That being in full operation, there was no necessity for a concurrent resolution of this kind, except as it might relate to conditions produced along the border between the two countries by some unlawful use, if that were possible, of the waters of the stream entirely within the physical jurisdiction of the United States.

It will be noted that this concurrent resolution of 1890 contains not the slightest reference either to the treaty obligations of the two countries or to the question of the navigability of the river. It can not be tortured by any refinement of construction, logical or otherwise, into an inclusion of either of these subjects, one of which afterwards became the foundation of governmental interference with a great private reclamation enterprise, beneficent in purpose and lawful in character, but wrecked and ruined that the international-dam scheme contemplated by the treaty of 1906 might triumph.

The five years succeeding 1890 were devoted by Gen. Mills and his satellites to the securing of an international dam to be constructed, first, by and at the joint expense of the two Governments, but later by ours alone, for the benefit of the Republic of Mexico, one terminus of which was to be within the geographical jurisdiction of Mexico, even though it should require the Government of the United States, in order to accomplish that end, to cede a small part of its domain to Mexico for that purpose. The basis both of argument and of convention for this international dam was the assertion by Mexican authorities and the unjustifiable admission by our authorities, speaking through Gen. Mills, that the rights of Mexican citizens to the waters of the Rio Grande for agricultural purposes had been and were being violated, their treaty rights ignored, their equitable rights disregarded through excessive appropriations of water for the purposes of irrigation in the State of Colorado and the then Territory of New Mexico, the contention being during this period that these two political divisions of the United States—and Colorado particularly—had appropriated the entire river supply, in consequence of which great scarcity of water existed below, that Mexicans were not only unable to cultivate their soil, but were famishing for the want of water.

Now, I want to call attention right here to an extract from the testimony of Gen. Mills during the initial period of these negotiations—I call them "negotiations"; technically they were not so. He said:

> There is at present a popular opinion that this want of water comes from its diversion by the numerous irrigating canals lately taken out in Colorado and New Mexico, and it is problematical what effect this may have, if any. I am of the opinion that most of the water returns to the stream again * * * as from personal observation I know that these seasons of flood and drought were of about the same character 30 years ago.

Assuming the truth of this assertion, it is difficult to sustain the contention that diversions of these waters above the boundary line had any influence whatever upon the volume of the stream at the point in controversy. In the case of Col. Mills, it is an admission against interest and therefore of great importance. But it is more than that.

Mr. President, it is one of a number of irreconcilable statements which have characterized the processes of the gentleman representing the Government of the United States upon its southern boundary prior to and since the negotiation of this treaty. In this instance, however, I cheerfully bear witness to the fact that he told the truth. That our appropriation of these waters within the limits of the State of Colorado and their diversion to beneficial uses has not in any manner affected the flow of the stream below, except to increase it, is a fact now so generally recognized as to be no longer the subject of dispute.

Mr. President, this river has its headwaters in the State of Colorado, and many of its smaller tributaries, perhaps the greater part of them above the point where the river becomes the international boundary are within the State of Colorado in whole or in part. Hence, they belong to the people of that State. Their diversion and application to the soil increases the seepage area, equalizes the flow of the stream, and adds to the volume of its waters. In support of this contention I shall read an extract from an official report of the United States Geological Survey, entitled "Water supply paper 240; geology and water resources of the San Luis Valley of Colorado," by C. E. Siebenthal, who says:

> At this point it may not be amiss to call attention to some facts bearing on the interstate relations of irrigation in the San Luis Valley. Agriculture and irrigation spread up the Rio Grande Valley from Mexico and Texas, through New Mexico, to the San Luis Valley in Colorado. With the rapid expansion of irrigation in the San Luis Valley the water of the Rio Grande was largely withdrawn in Colorado, to the alleged great detriment of agriculture on the lower course of the river. The question of prior rights to the use of the water became a subject for interstate and international discussion. Maj. Powell, in 1890, testifying before the Senate Special Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands, said:

"Passing into New Mexico, then, the water that practically heads in the high mountains of Colorado is largely, almost wholly, cut off from the Rio Grande, so that no portion of the water that heads in these mountains, where there is great precipitation, will cross the line into New Mexico (in the dry season). * * * In a dry season nothing can be raised in the lower region, and sometimes dry seasons come two or three together."

Nevertheless Maj. Powell argued that it is advantageous that the water in a stream be used for irrigation as near to its source as possible, since there the duty of water is greatest and the loss from evaporation and seepage is least.

"In the valley of the Rio Grande the greater portion of the water during the season of irrigation is lost in the sands, as in the valley of the Arkansas. If the water of the Rio Grande is compelled to flow across the line from Colorado into New Mexico, it will destroy from 1,000,000 to 1,500,000 acres of agriculture above in order to save 200,000 or 300,000 acres in the valley below."

Maj. Powell urged that the tributaries of the Rio Grande below the Colorado-New Mexico line would, if the water were conserved, furnish a sufficient flow to maintain the irrigation of that section as then developed. He pointed out that "when the river emerges into the valley at the foot of Embudo Canyon"—

And that is the point, Mr. President, where this river debouches into New Mexico—

"it is a fine stream and must always be so, whatever water is taken out in Colorado above." That this somewhat startling and paradoxical statement is borne out by the facts is indicated in the following paragraphs, where the explanation is suggested.

Time, Mr. President, will not permit me to give the reasons, which are conclusive in their nature upon this subject, and which are set forth in this Government publication so fully and so conclusively.

We all know who Maj. Powell was—a pioneer in the exploration and study of western water courses, for many years a Government employee, an authority upon all such matters. I may have occasion to refer to some of his statements later on, but I take it for granted that any position taken by him concerning the amount and flow of water in our mountain streams, the effect of their use near their headwaters upon the persistent flow of the stream farther down—subject, of course, to those developments which have come from experience since his death—will stand unchallenged and uncontradicted by anyone who knows anything about the history of the man.

I have, however, other testimony upon that subject, to which I shall refer briefly, the first being that of Maj. Emery, who, I think, was at the time a member of the Board of Army Engineers. He explored the river in 1852 and 1854. He said:

How far the lower Rio Bravo—

is supplied by melting snows at the head of the river I am not prepared to say, but I am inclined to the opinion that before reaching the Tertiary region most of the waters are expended either by evaporation or absorption. In the intermediate portion of the Rio Bravo—that lying between Valverde * * * and the Presidio del Norte, where the Conchos joins it and supplies it with water from the Tropics—a great inconvenience is felt for water in years of unusual drought. I was informed, on good authority, that in the summer of 1851 a man drove a gang of mules along the bed of the river from Presidio del Norte to El Paso. The bed was dry for nearly the whole of the distance, occasional pools of water standing in places where the river bed was formed of clay or rock impervious to water.

This testimony is negative in its character; but it emphasizes the fact that before the State of Colorado was settled by white men, during a period when the only diversions of water for purposes of irrigation were those of Mexicans and Indians in the Territory of New Mexico, the bed of the stream during the dry season of the year was just as lacking in water supply, and perhaps more so, than it has been since the appropriation and diversion of waters in the San Luis Valley in my State.

Mr. Follette is the engineer of the International Boundary Commission, and thoroughly devoted to the scheme which found its consummation in the treaty of 1906. In his report, made after a careful examination, he said upon this subject what I shall read from page 53 of the same document:

Up to about 1880 there were living in the El Paso Valley * * * some 30,000 people—about 20,000 on the Mexican side of the river, and 10,000, more or less, on the United States side. * * * About once in seven or eight years the river would go dry for a short time in the summer, and I think that occasionally, although not every time the river was dry, there was a shortage of crops.

That quotation is from his statement on March 11 1902, before the House Committee on Foreign Affairs. The remainder of the quotation, I think, is from his official report upon the subject.

The use of water for irrigation in New Mexico has not materially increased since 1880, and hence is not the cause of this decreased flow.

In view of these statistics, I would suggest that the injury claimed to have been done to the El Paso Valley by recent diversions of the water of the Rio Grande has not come from an increased use of the water in New Mexico.

The river went dry many years before the large use of water in Colorado began. The records show that in 1851 it was dry as far north as Socorro, N. Mex. Again in 1860 or 1861 it was dry in the Mesilla Valley, and 1879 was the driest year on record prior to 1889, the flow ceasing nearly or quite as far north as Albuquerque.

Mr. President, in the case of Kansas against Colorado, reported in Two hundred and sixth United States, it was demonstrated by testimony of the most indubitable character that the diversion of the waters of the Arkansas River in the irrigating districts of Colorado had not only steadied but increased the flow of the stream below the boundary line between the two States. That river is sometimes called, locally, a broken river, by which is meant that at a certain place or places in Kansas the sands absorb the water completely and the current becomes subterranean. It then reappears some 150 miles below that point, and from there flows on to its junction with the waters of the Mississippi. It was there demonstrated that the point where these waters heretofore had disappeared at the dam had traveled eastward for, I think, 40 or 50 miles—I do not pretend to give the exact distance—which was caused by the increased drainage area holding, through irrigation, the waters of the stream in the lands above.

Hence I am justified in saying from these experiences, together with the positive assurance of officials of the Government, that the diversions of water from the Rio Grande for beneficial uses in the State of Colorado not only do not diminish the flow in the State of New Mexico, but add to and increase the volume, consequent upon the increased drainage area supplied with water for the cultivation of this land, thereby causing it to flow more slowly and yet more certainly into the main stream, equalizing also the general current of the river throughout the year.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. THOMAS. I do.

Mr. WORKS. I should like to ask the Senator from Colorado to what extent the water for irrigation in Colorado was derived from stored water that caused the increase, as the Senator says, in the flow of the stream?

Mr. THOMAS. In the instance of Kansas against Colorado the storage of water had a great deal to do with it. But very little of the waters of the Rio Grande are stored in the State of Colorado, for the double reason that there are only one or two great reservoirs above the San Luis Valley and that our use of the flood waters there has been interdicted since the departmental order of December, 1896. Even if it were true, however, that the diversion and use of these waters for beneficial purposes in the State of Colorado diminish their flow elsewhere, we are entitled to the diversion and use by virtue of our ownership of the waters of the natural streams in the State—an ownership conferred upon us by the enabling act and constitution duly accepted by Congress and by the President—an ownership which has been ratified and confirmed by repeated decisions of the State and the Federal courts. Those waters are as much the property of the people, subject to appropriation for beneficial uses, as are the lands we hold in private ownership or the public buildings of the States and of the counties, and more important than all, because they constitute the very lifeblood of our expanding civilization.

Those States, Mr. President, are the outgrowth of the scientific and practical application of water to beneficial uses. They support large populations; and if the further use of these waters were encouraged, and the lands were subject to utilization to the extent that they can be by the conservation of all these waters, there is no section of the Union that would show greater progress in all that goes to make the great Commonwealths of the Union. Hence I contend that our use of our own property for our own purposes in the reclamation of the lands of the desert, the extension of the fertile areas of the country, and the addition of population and of taxable wealth, without regard to Mexico and the Mexicans, are strictly within the line of right and justice; and neither the Government of the United States nor any other power has any right, by treaty stipulation, to deprive us of what is ours and of what the necessities of climatic conditions make absolutely necessary if the country is to continue to be inhabited or to grow.

Even if we had no right to the use of these waters, even if it were true that the Government had authority to deprive us, as it has done, of the use of two and three-quarter million acre-feet of water, as it is now doing, I think it is demonstrable that not a drop of water passing through the Embudo Canon reaches the point where this so-called international dam is being constructed.

I call attention to the affidavit of Brig. Gen. Mills—for he is now a brigadier general, retired, although receiving the pay and perquisites of a colonel in active service—filed in behalf of the United States in the case entitled "The United States of America against Rio Grande Dam & Irrigation Co." now on record in the Supreme Court of the United States and verified by him on the 23d day of June, 1897. It is somewhat out of the course of the discussion, but is very appropriate here. In this affidavit Gen. Mills says, among other things:

That while engaged in gauging the flow of the river—

And this experience of his with the river extended over almost a generation—he was also engaged in observing the evaporation—

This was at El Paso—

and discovered that the evaporation was over 6 feet from the surface per annum at El Paso, Tex., and as the region is arid for 200 miles above and below El Paso it is presumed that the evaporation would be about the same that distance, and that the impounding of a large quantity of the flow of the river in a lake as proposed would, in his opinion, largely increase the ordinary evaporation of the waters, as would the distribution of the waters through numerous canals and ditches, as proposed, through the arid soil, and, in addition thereto, there would be still a great loss by seepage into the dry and porous earth, a very small portion of which seepage would in all probability return to the river, and this opinion is based upon his actual observation and knowledge of the irrigating systems of this country, soil, and climate.

If this testimony is reliable and the Government relied upon it, we may safely assume that evaporation in transit from the dam to Mexico, plus the seepage, would be equal to the evaporation from the reservoir, or nearly 50 per cent of the water supply. And we may also assume that evaporation and seepage from Colorado to the dam would be quite as constant and effective. How much, then, of this great body of water of which we are so unjustly deprived benefits either the people of Mexico or anybody else?

I shall show hereafter that the Government dam is now being constructed at the very spot where Gen. Mills swore that, if constructed, a dam could serve no purpose except one of obstruction to the accomplishment of the requirements of his indefensible treaty.

If it be true, however, that there is, through evaporation, a loss of 6 feet per annum in that river at El Paso, when we consider that, following the meanderings of the stream, the southern boundary of the State of Colorado is four or five hundred miles from that point, what must be the effect of evaporation upon the waters of the river which flow from the State of Colorado into the State—then the Territory—of New Mexico? Why, Mr. President, the thirsty soil and the still more thirsty sun would absorb every drop of it long before it could reach this point 115 miles north of the boundary between the two countries. So, as far as concerns the necessity of placing this embargo upon the use of water by the people of the State of Colorado, that necessity, however urgent it may appear, can not in the nature of things be satisfied in the slightest degree by preventing the use of water for the irrigation of lands above.

We now reach a very interesting point in the history of this treaty. Prior to the year 1895 a company was organized called the Rio Grande Dam & Irrigation Co. It was financed by English capital. Its object was to build a dam at a point called Elephant Buttes, 115 miles north of El Paso, where the river passes through two gigantic cliffs, a place which nature evidently had designed for a great storage dam and reservoir. Below this point is the Mesilla Valley, a valley which is potentially fruitful, and which is made so, in fact, by the application of water in the usual ways and methods of irrigation. This company proposed to construct its dam, to create thereby one of the largest artificial lakes in the world, and utilize its waters for the reclamation of all the lands in the Mesilla Valley and some of the lands in the State of Texas. Its filings were approved by Secretary Hoke Smith, of the Interior Department, on the 1st day of February, 1895, and active work was at once begun upon the project. It had behind it plenty of money, intelligent management, and a splendid prospect of successful completion and operation.

At this point what I may call the navigation principle or doctrine entered into the situation for the first time. I may say that this project proposed to impound the flood waters of the river only. It was not proposed to impound any of the waters of the natural flow of the stream, which had long since been appropriated, but to utilize the great floods which sweep down the river when the mountain snows are thawing and when the spring rains are active, and which, unless they can be impounded, run without hindrance to the sea, being a source of great danger instead of a source of great benefit.

I have already called attention to the fact that, according to Gen. Mills, there was annually a destructive abundance of these flood waters. They caused avulsions upon the one bank or the other of the stream, both above and below the point where it becomes the international boundary. In consequence of this, the treaty of 1884 had been negotiated, and, supplemented by that of 1889, designed to adjust all controversies consequent upon the shifting channel of the stream, which shifting was due entirely to the enormous periodical floods and the unchecked and untamed waters which caused them.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning hour having expired, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 41) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to sell or lease certain public lands to the Republic Coal Co., a corporation.

Mr. THOMAS. I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed.

Mr. McCUMBER. Before granting the unanimous consent, I wish to ask the Senator about how long he expects to take?

Mr. THOMAS. I am afraid I shall not be able to finish what I have to say to-day. I do not want to impose upon the good nature and accommodating spirit of gentlemen who are interested in the unfinished business, and therefore, if I can be allowed to finish to-morrow, after the close of the routine business, I shall speak not later than 3 o'clock to-day.

Mr. McCUMBER. With that understanding I shall not object to the Senator continuing.

Mr. THOMAS. Whether I am through or not, I will conclude for the day at that hour.

The VICE PRESIDENT. By unanimous consent, and without prejudice, the unfinished business will be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. THOMAS. In the affidavit previously referred to, Gen. Mills also swore:

Affiant further states that in past years, namely, 40 years ago, there was comparatively an abundance of water in the river, and that it seldom went dry (about only once in seven years), and then for a very short time, generally about the month of August or September; that in later years the waters have been much depleted during the summer and fall, but the flood waters of the spring are still great, and they last from one to two months, during which period they are susceptible of carrying small boats, flatboats, rafts, and logs.

He was here trying to demonstrate the present navigability of the stream.

At times, periodically each year, the volume of water is so great that steamboats could navigate it for hundreds of miles both above and below El Paso, Tex.

Surely here is water enough for all the people of both Republics. Here is a western Mississippi transient in duration, but carrying to the Gulf a rushing torrent, one-tenth of which, if stayed by dams and reservoirs, would supply the needs of every acre of land in that vast domain.

Mr. President, I do not, of course, concede the truth of this extraordinary statement, but I do contend that the flood waters in the river were and are to-day ample to supply the needs of this private company and all the subsequent requirements of the Government under its treaty obligations with the Republic of Mexico, without at all interfering with the free, unrestricted and abundant use of the waters of this stream by the good people of the States of Colorado and New Mexico.

I have said that up to this time Gen. Mills and his coadjutors, whoever they were, were busy with their international dam, which would, of course, if constructed, be a complete bar to the alleged navigation of the river above the point where it was to be located, and that was but 2 or 3 miles above the city of El Paso. During the time between the concurrent resolution of 1890 and the institution of this enterprise by the Rio Grande Dam & Irrigation Co. Gen. Mills had been duly authorized and was extremely active with his Mexican associates in drafting, proposing, and endeavoring to procure a treaty between the two countries for the construction of his notorious international dam. But nothing was said about navigation; no heed was given to it. Exhibit F of Senate document 154, Fifty-seventh Congress, second session, is a copy of his proposed treaty. It is so one-sided, so absolutely destructive of the rights and almost of the dignity of the United States, that it was too much even for a State Department which afterwards negotiated the treaty of 1906.

I ask permission to print Exhibit F of this document in my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POMERENE in the chair). Without objection it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

EXHIBIT F.

ATTEMPT TO DEPRIVE NEW MEXICO OF HER RIGHT TO THE WATERS OF THE RIO GRANDE AND ITS TRIBUTARIES—RUIN FOR NEW MEXICO'S FARMERS.

Proposed treaty with Mexico.

(Translation.)

The Government of the United States of Mexico and the Government of the United States of America, wishing to put an end in a friendly and amicable manner to the controversy arising from the use in the State of Colorado and the Territory of New Mexico of the waters of the Rio Bravo del Norte and its tributaries, constituting the dividing line between the two countries from Paso del Norte to its mouth in the Gulf of Mexico, owing to which use the people living on its banks below Paso del Norte, who had a prior right to these waters from having used them in the irrigation of their lands for nearly 400 years, have been deprived of them, as it appears that that part of the said river between El Paso and the Conchos River is left without water during several months of the year, and as the freshets occasion changes by avulsion and erosion, giving rise to frequent disputes and difficulties, have agreed, after considering the report of the special mixed commission appointed to investigate this subject and to suggest a fair settlement securing the mutual rights of the two countries interested, to conclude a convention for that purpose, and have appointed their respective plenipotentiaries:

The President of the United States of Mexico, by his envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary at Washington; and

The President of the United States of America, by his Secretary of State;

Who, after showing each other their respective full powers and finding them in good and due form, have agreed upon the following articles:

ARTICLE 1.

To attain the ends mentioned in the preamble to this convention an international dam shall be constructed in the Rio Bravo del Norte within as short time as possible, not exceeding ——— years, about 3 miles above El Paso, 15 miles long and about 3½ miles wide, in the manner and upon the conditions proposed by the mixed commission.

ARTICLE 2.

In compensation for the damage suffered by Mexican citizens in consequence of the use of the waters of the Rio Bravo del Norte in the State of Colorado and the Territory of New Mexico, the Government of the United States of America will bear all the expenses necessary for the construction of the dam in the manner proposed in the opinion of the special commission and will cede to the Government of Mexico the territory referred to in article 3 of this convention.

ARTICLE 3.

In order that the dam, the construction of which is provided for by this convention, may have a real international character—that is to say, that it may be constructed upon the dividing line between the two countries—the United States of America agrees to cede to Mexico such territory as may be necessary, which, according to the report of the special mixed commission, will not exceed 100 acres, in order that the southern side of the dam may be in Mexican territory.

The Government of the United States of Mexico will recognize and respect in ceded territory the rights granted by the Government of the United States of America to the Southern Pacific Railroad Co. on that part of its track passing through the territory ceded.

ARTICLE 4.

The Government of the United States of Mexico will appoint such officer or agents as it may deem expedient to superintend the construction of the dam, in order that it may be in conformity with the provisions of this convention and the specifications of the work.

ARTICLE 5.

Half of the water contained in the dam shall belong to each of the contracting parties, and each shall appoint a commissioner and such other employees as it may think necessary to arrange the equal apportionment of the water, and to see that what is left in case either or both the Governments do not consume the half belonging to them, is disposed of in such a way that the dam will be emptied and filled with regularity, and that, so far as possible, a uniform current will be maintained in the river, so as to prevent changes in its bed by erosion or avulsion. In doubtful cases the decision of the two commissioners shall be regarded as binding upon both Governments unless one of them shall disapprove it within one month, in which case the two Governments shall take cognizance of the matter themselves, and decide it amicably in such manner as shall appear to them just and expedient.

The same course shall be adopted when the commissioners disagree as to the point causing the doubt or dispute, in which case each commissioner shall draw up his opinion in writing and present it to his own Government.

ARTICLE 6.

To prevent new appropriations of water which might still more diminish the volume of the Rio Bravo del Norte (Rio Grande) hereafter, and thereby prevent the passage of the water necessary to fill the dam to which this convention refers, the Government of the United States of America binds itself to issue the necessary regulations, and to apply, if necessary, to the Congress of the United States of America for legislation to prevent the construction of new works or canals on the Rio Bravo del Norte and its tributaries, on that part passing through the territory of the United States of America, or, if they are constructed, to prevent the volume of water being diminished to such an extent that it will not supply the dam, and to institute prompt and efficacious legal proceedings to prevent the violation of the provisions of this convention.

ARTICLE 7.

The two Governments shall appoint a mixed commission of engineers to lay off the dividing line in accordance with the provisions of article 3 of this convention, and the line run by that commission shall be regarded hereafter as the dividing line between the two countries.

ARTICLE 8.

In compensation for the expenses which the Government of the United States of America has to undergo in the construction of the dam, and in consideration of the cession of territory referred to in article 3 of this convention, the Government of the United States of Mexico regards as satisfied all claims of Mexican citizens against the Government of the United States of America arising from the want of water in the Rio Bravo del Norte, caused by the taking of water in the State of Colorado and the Territory of New Mexico, and expects no indemnity for such damage.

ARTICLE 9.

The present convention shall be ratified by the two parties in accordance with their respective constitutional procedure, and the ratifications shall be exchanged at Washington as soon as possible.

In witness whereof the undersigned plenipotentiaries have signed and sealed the same.

Done in duplicate in the city of Washington, in the Spanish and English languages, this —— day of ———.

Mr. THOMAS. It will be seen that among other things this document recites that:

In compensation for the damage suffered by Mexican citizens in consequence of the use of the waters of the Rio Bravo del Norte, in the State of Colorado and the Territory of New Mexico—

Naming them in terms—

the Government of the United States of America will bear all the expenses necessary for the construction of the dam in the manner proposed in the opinion of the special commission, and will cede to the Government of Mexico the territory referred to in article 3 of this convention.

This man proposed by admitting an element of damage which never existed to compensate Mexico for the resulting injury by providing that the United States of America should bear the entire expense of constructing a dam that would be international in its character and therefore subject to the mutual control of the two Republics.

But article 3 is still more extraordinary. There it is provided—

In order that the dam, the construction of which is provided for by this convention, may have a real international character—that is to say, that it may be constructed upon the dividing line between the two countries—the United States of America agrees to cede to Mexico such territory as may be necessary, which, according to the report of the special mixed commission—

And that is the best name for it that I have discovered anywhere—

will not exceed 100 acres, in order that the southern side of the dam may be in Mexican territory.

The Government of the United States of Mexico will recognize and respect in ceded territory the rights granted by the Government of the United States of America to the Southern Pacific Railroad Co. on that part of its track passing through the territory ceded.

I now call attention to article 6 of this proposed treaty. It is the gem of the entire aggregation:

To prevent new appropriations of water which might still more diminish the volume of the Rio Bravo del Norte (Rio Grande) hereafter, and thereby prevent the passage of the water necessary to fill the dam to which this convention refers, the Government of the United States of America binds itself to issue the necessary regulations and to apply, if necessary, to the Congress of the United States of America for legislation to prevent the construction of new works or canals on the Rio Bravo del Norte and its tributaries on that part passing through the territory of the United States of America, or, if they are constructed, to prevent the volume of water being diminished to such an extent that it will not supply the dam, and to institute prompt and efficacious legal proceedings to prevent the violation of the provisions of this convention.

Mr. President, I think I can affirm safely that this is the most extraordinary draft of a proposed treaty ever deliberately framed and submitted to the consideration of the diplomatic authorities of the United States.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. By whom was it drawn?

Mr. THOMAS. It was drawn by Gen. Anson Mills and by his Mexican associate, Señor Osorno, who were designated as a special commission for the purpose of providing for a plan of international dam construction, to supply water to compensate Mexico and her citizens for alleged injuries which the Department of Justice in 1895 emphatically declared had no legal merit or existence.

Of course, I am aware that this treaty never could have been adopted; but it is a good illustration of the extent to which those interested in the proposed measure were eager to go for the sake of securing the success of the enterprise, and the motive behind it can not be reconciled with any honest or honorable purpose. Another peculiar thing about this proposed international dam and treaty is that Gen. Mills, according to his own testimony—Senate Document No. 154, page 51—knew that at El Paso no bedrock could be found as a base for the dam except by going a very great and financially impossible depth to secure it. He also knew that the Derby report——

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. THOMAS. In just a moment. Capt. Derby, a member of the Board of Army Engineers, had reported in 1896 to that effect. I refer to Senate document 154, page 48. So this man proposed a treaty with Mexico for an international dam at the expense of the United States where he knew no dam could be built at all.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield first to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. If I understand the Senator's position correctly, it would have made no difference in regard to their enterprise what might have been done in the way of restricting the use of water above in the stream. As I understand the Senator, even though the use of water had been entirely denied to the irrigators of Colorado and New Mexico, they could not have carried out their scheme.

Mr. THOMAS. No; not their scheme as outlined in the Derby report.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course they evidently supposed they could, or they would not have undertaken it.

Mr. THOMAS. One would have so supposed, but the record shows——

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that, but I can hardly understand how you could explain their conduct unless you would concede that they supposed that by building this international dam there would be more irrigating dams down there.

Mr. THOMAS. Perhaps I will come to that later on, but I am obliged for the interruption. They contended that some 3 or 4 miles above the engineers had discovered a point where by removing the railroad tracks of the Sante Fe and Southern Pacific Cos., of course at Government expense, they could reach a proper foundation for an international dam, if my memory serves me, something like 200 or 250 feet below the surface. I now yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WARREN. I desire to ask the Senator what the cost of that dam was estimated to be?

Mr. THOMAS. The cost of the dam, which is now under construction, together with the canals and other adjuncts, is estimated at $10,000,000.

Mr. WARREN. That is the so-called Elephant Butte Dam?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes. The Government calls it the Engle Dam.

Mr. WARREN. Perhaps the Senator will correct me, but my remembrance is that the Government only appropriated from the general fund $1,000,000 to build the dam, and that the balance of it was proposed to be taken from the reclamation fund.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator is correct, but about the time, or shortly after that appropriation was made, this enterprise, in addition to being an international one, became a reclamation project.

Mr. WARREN. Am I right in supposing that all the money taken from the $10,000,000, or whatever the amount may be, could be taken out of the reclamation fund except the initial million dollars?

Mr. THOMAS. Such is my understanding. The total amount of Government domain, for which they propose to impound 2,760,000 acre-feet of water at the Engle Dam, is less than 14,000 acres.

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator I visited the site of this dam when they were having some difficulty in finding bedrock, as he states, and I was of opinion then that the Government should make some other provision than the appropriation from the general fund of one-tenth and the balance to be taken from the money that comes from the several States into the reclamation fund, when, as a matter of fact, there was very little land in this country that would come under the dam.

Mr. THOMAS. I propose to show before I get through that not only has the treaty power of the Government been successfully utilized or perverted so as to carry out this scheme, but the purpose and funds of the reclamation law and project are being utilized and perverted to the same end.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. I was going to ask the Senator in regard to the location of the dam now under construction. Is it in the same locality?

Mr. THOMAS. No, sir; it is 115 miles above the city of El Paso.

Mr. NORRIS. It is the dam that was proposed to be built at one time by English capital.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes. But the Government makes a very amusing distinction between the dam destroyed and the dam which it is building. It is officially announced by the State Department that the Government dam is a mile below the projected private dam. In connection with the contemplated international dam I will read the statement of Gen. Mills. In his report of December 10, 1888, he says:

> Each succeeding year hundreds of Mexicans pile loose stones on the top of the drift of rocks (on which the present intercepting or diverting dam is built) to raise the level to that carried away by the floods of the preceding year, and it has been estimated by a Federal engineer sent from the city of Mexico that, had the labor thus expended been reduced to silver, the dam could have been built of the solid metal. The difficulty has been and always will be that there is neither bed rock nor solid earth in the bottom or banks,

A condition which, according to the statement, makes the expense which the Mexicans had already incurred in attempting to build some sort of an obstruction there equal to the weight of the material in silver, and upon which he proposes to build an international dam at national expense to secure future and perpetual amity between the people of the two countries.

Mr. President, the forces behind this movement during the negotiations of the commission were also active in Congress, and bills were introduced in the Fifty-sixth and Fifty-seventh Congresses relating to the subject which, but for the vigilance of Dr. Boyd, of the Rio Grande Dam & Irrigation Co., would have become law. Page 67 of Senate Document No. 154 refers to bill S. 3794, introduced in the Senate during the then session and favorably reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations, as shown by Senate Report No. 1755, Calendar No. 1736: "This bill is similar in general character and purpose to a bill introduced in the House during the Fifty-sixth Congress, first session, being bill H. R. 9710. Both these bills authorized the construction of an international dam on the Rio Grande at or near El Paso, Tex., and both contain a clause which virtually forbids hereafter the construction of reservoirs or dams appropriating or storing the waters of the Rio Grande in the Territory of New Mexico."

Protest was made by Dr. Boyd, and the attention of the country and of the western Senators was called to these bills, and, fortunately, they were defeated.

Now, let me call attention to Exhibit E in this document, which I will ask permission to have printed in my remarks. It is a copy of a bill introduced in the House of Representatives on the 23d day of April, 1902, by Mr. STEPHENS. It will interest western Senators particularly to read the preamble and substance of this bill. That it had the same interests and influences behind it is unquestioned. I shall not take the time to read it, but it virtually provides that nothing in previous acts concerning the same subject shall authorize the further appropriation and storage of the waters of the Rio Grande or its tributaries in the Territory of New Mexico.

The exhibit referred to is as follows:

EXHIBIT E.

BILL TO PREVENT IRRIGATION IN NEW MEXICO.

[H. R. 13963, Fifty-seventh Congress, first session.]

In the House of Representative, April 23, 1902, Mr. Stephens introduced the following bill; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and ordered to be printed:

A bill to provide for the equitable distribution of the waters of the Rio Grande River between the United States of America and the United States of Mexico.

Whereas the Republic of Mexico has made reclamation of the United States to the Secretary of State, through its legation in Washington, for a large indemnity for water alleged to have been taken and used by the citizens of the United States in Colorado and New Mexico on the headwaters of the Rio Grande River to which citizens of Mexico claimed right by prior appropriation, in alleged violation of article 8 of the treaty of peace of Guadalupe Hidalgo, proclaimed July 4, 1848, and article 4 of the boundary treaty proclaimed June 30, 1854; and

Whereas an investigation directed jointly by the State Departments of the two Republics and carried out by the International Boundary Commission organized under the convention of March 1, 1889, discovered the fact that the flow of the river has gradually diminished for the past 15 years in an increasing ratio, so that the ordinary summer's flow in the lower river is inadequate to supply the wants of irrigation and domestic and other purposes, as has been supplied in previous years; and

Whereas a remedy has been proposed by the two Governments for this deficiency by impounding in an international dam and reservoir near the boundary line between the two Republics the annual flood waters of the spring season, which are greatly in excess of the wants of irrigation and domestic and other purposes in those seasons, such waters to be equitably distributed between the two Republics; and

Whereas it was afterwards discovered that other like projects of large dams and reservoirs were contemplated above said proposed international dam and reservoir; and

Whereas the two Governments jointly directed the International Boundary Commission hereinbefore mentioned to investigate and report upon the feasibility of the project; and

Whereas said commission reported that, in their judgment, the project was feasible, but that the flow was insufficient for more than one reservoir; and

Whereas the two Governments were unable to agree upon the construction of said proposed international dam and reservoir until some method of restraining the building and use of other dams and reservoirs which would destroy the usefulness of said proposed international dam and reservoir had been devised: Now, therefore,

Be it enacted, etc., That nothing in the acts of March 3, 1891, January 2, 1895, February 26, 1897, and May 11, 1898, shall be so construed as to authorize the appropriation and storage of the waters of the Rio Grande River or its tributaries in the Territory of New Mexico to which others have right by prior appropriation, and it shall be unlawful for any person or corporation to take, appropriate, or store said waters, and every person and every corporation which shall be guilty of such unlawful taking, appropriating, or storing said waters in this act mentioned shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment (in case of a natural person) not exceeding one year, or by both such punishments, in the discretion of the court. The unlawful taking, appropriating, and storing of the waters in this act mentioned may be prevented and the dam, reservoir, or other means used for impounding the water may be removed by the injunction of any circuit court exercising jurisdiction in any district in which said water may be appropriated, taken, or stored; and proper proceedings in equity to this end may be instituted under the direction of the Attorney General of the United States.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of State, if he thinks favorably of the proposal, is hereby requested to proceed with the consummation of a treaty between the United States of America and the United States of Mexico whereby the United States of Mexico shall accept the construction of the proposed dam and reservoir with the conditions that the water impounded by it shall be equally distributed between the two countries as liquidation of all past and future claims for water appropriated in the past or to be appropriated in the future by the citizens of the United States.

When this treaty is executed the Secretary of State is authorized to proceed with the construction of said dam and reservoir in general accordance with the sketch plans made in 1889 by the officials of the United States Geological Survey, as referred to in the report of the International Boundary Commission as published in Senate Document No. 229, Fifty-fifth Congress, second session, and according to detail plans and specifications to be made by engineers whom he may employ, and the sum of $2,317,113.36 is hereby appropriated for that purpose.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. THOMAS. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I am curious to know, if the Senator has the facts, why such an enormous appropriation on the part of the Government of the United States is to be taken from a fund that we are inclined to consider as somewhat sacred to irrigate only a few thousand acres of land. I am curious to know what land on the Mexican side is to be irrigated by this international dam, and by whom they are owned. Who has title to those lands on the Mexican side?

Mr. THOMAS. The lands are private property. They are and have been for a great many years cultivated on the Mexican side by citizens of that Republic who have doubtless lived there from generation to generation.

Mr. WARREN. May I ask the Senator what is the number of acres? Is it something like 60,000?

Mr. THOMAS. No, sir. I will read from the ninth annual report of the Reclamation Service, to show of what the lands consist.

Mr. WARREN. That is, the land the United States agreed to furnish water for.

Mr. THOMAS. Sixty thousand acre-feet for 25,000 acres of land.

I read from page 218 of that report:

Irrigable area: One hundred and sixty thousand acres in the United States (including 25,000 acres in the Leasburg project) and 25,000 acres in Mexico, making a total of 185,000 acres of the land in the United States.

The greater proportion is in the State of Texas. It never was national domain. It was never designed to be embraced within the reclamation projects, but was brought in as a part of this general scheme, as I shall show hereafter by later acts of Congress.

Present status of irrigable lands (in the United States): 1,423 acres entered under the reclamation act, 11,616 acres withdrawn from entry, 146,961 acres in private ownership.

Now, for that 185,000 acres of land let me read what the engineering data for the complete project is:

Reservoir: Engle—Area, 41,280 acres; capacity, 2,760,000 acre-feet; length of spillway, not determined; elevation of spillway, 200 feet above the stream bed.

That is the equivalent of 15 acre-feet per acre for the reclamation of 185,000 acres of land 25,000 acres of which are in a foreign country.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. THOMAS. I do.

Mr. WARREN. Following the question I asked a moment ago about the quantity of land, I understand the Senator now to say there are but 25,000 acres on the Mexican side that the Government agreed to furnish water for?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes, sir; 60,000 acre-feet.

Mr. WARREN. Sixty thousand acre-feet, of course, on land which has heretofore been irrigated would be a very extraordinary amount.

Mr. THOMAS. I shall show before I get through that it is nearly three times more than is actually necessary.

Mr. WARREN. That is why I thought it was 60,000 acres, and not 60,000 cubic feet.

Mr. THOMAS. I will say to the Senator that I fell into the same error until I found it desirable to verify my figures.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to ask the Senator, does the law provide for the payment by the owners of the land of a proportionate share of the expense?

Mr. THOMAS. I do not see how it is possible, because it is all in private ownership. The purpose of the construction of the dam was not to reclaim American land, but to carry out the terms and conditions of a treaty.

Mr. NORRIS. I am asking if it could be done.

Mr. THOMAS. As to what the arrangements are between the Reclamation Service and the private ownership of the land I am not able at present to answer. The reclamation policy is to confine the ownership of land under this scheme to a very small area per individual.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not think the Senator quite gets the question as I meant it. I supposed he was familiar with the law authorizing the construction of this reservoir.

Mr. THOMAS. There is nothing in the law about it.

Mr. NORRIS. That is what I wanted to ask about.

Mr. THOMAS. No.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, if there is nothing in the law there would be no obligation to do it.

Mr. THOMAS. Except to provide for the money already expended there. I shall come to that later.

Mr. WARREN. I take it there was no agreement with the Mexican Government in any way except to furnish this water in the amount named. There was nothing further as to the additional land that the Mexicans might wish to irrigate?

Mr. THOMAS. No; there is nothing further in the treaty, and, of course, I must speak by that. But, Mr. President, immediately after the Interior Department authorized by its order the construction of the Elephant Butte Dam by the Rio Grande Dam & Irrigation Co. the projectors of this international dam scheme began to attack it, through the agency of Anson Mills, because they contended at first that there was not sufficient water to fill the reservoir at Elephant Butte and an international reservoir to be constructed at El Paso. Of course, from the standpoint of Gen. Mills and his associates, the demands of the Mexicans for water were paramount to those of American citizens, and so paramount that at all hazards everything should be subordinated to that fact. They therefore challenged the efficiency of the order of Secretary SMITH granting permission to construct this dam and reservoir, because they now contended, forsooth, the construction of the dam at that point would interfere with the navigability of the river, both above and below the point of its site, and that in the very face of the necessary fact that the construction of their international dam would have precisely the same effect.

At this point the Mexican minister comes into the situation with a letter, dated the 21st day of October, 1895, to Mr. Olney, then Secretary of State under Mr. Cleveland. This letter is item No. 1 in Senate Document No. 154. I shall merely ask permission to incorporate it in my remarks without reading it.

The matter referred to is as follows:

ITEM 1.

MR. ROMERO TO MR. OLNEY.

[Translation.]

LEGATION OF MEXICO,
Washington, October 21, 1895.

Mr. SECRETARY: I have addressed your department on various occasions, communicating the instructions which I have received from my Government to endeavor to secure the adoption of an arrangement designed to remedy the evils which are suffered by the inhabitants of the Mexican bank of the Rio Grande from Paso del Norte to a distance of about 200 kilometers below.

Paso del Norte and the adjacent region down the river are situated in the center of the dry zone and consequently can not depend upon the rains for their agricultural operations, but are obliged to depend upon irrigation. From a report of the weather bureau at El Paso, Tex., dated August 25, 1894, a copy of which is herewith inclosed, it appears that the total rainfall registered from August 15, 1893, to August 14, 1894, was 4.97 inches, or next to nothing at all.

The city of Paso del Norte has been in existence for more than 300 years, and during (almost) all that time its people have enjoyed the use of the water of the Rio Grande for the irrigation of their lands; and as that city and the districts within its jurisdiction did not need more than 20 cubic meters of water per second, which is almost an infinitesimal portion of the amount of water which flowed down the river, even in times of the severest drought they had sufficient water for their crops until about 10 years ago, when a great many trenches were dug in the State of Colorado (especially in the St. Louis Valley) and in the Territory of New Mexico, through which the Rio Grande and its affluents flow. The volume of water thus taken has so greatly diminished—that which is brought by the river to Paso del Norte—that when the rains are not very abundant there is a scarcity of water from the 15th of June of one year till the month of March of the next, which is the very time when water is most needed for the crops.

In the year 1894 the river became dried up entirely by the 15th of June, and only when it rained in New Mexico was there any water in it, and that lasted, of course, for but a short time. In that year the farmers were unable to raise any Indian corn, vegetables, or grapes, and the scarcity of water was such that even the fruit trees began to wither.

This state of things has naturally reduced the price of the land, which was good until that time, to an extremely low figure, and has diminished the population of that region very considerably. In 1875 there was at Paso del Norte, Zaragoza, Tres Jacales, Guadalupe, and San Ignacio a population of about 20,000, which in 1894 was reduced to half that number. Farms no longer produce enough to support their owners, and the situation of the people is wretched in the extreme, because, as they are unable to raise vegetables or other articles necessary to support life, they are obliged to send for them a distance of from 500 to 1,000 miles, their cost being thus increased, while the people's means of paying for what they need are greatly diminished.

The United States Congress recognized the serious injury suffered by the Mexicans in a concurrent resolution approved April 29, 1890, whereby it recommended to the President of the United States to enter into negotiations with the Mexican Government with a view to deciding upon such means as might tend to remedy the difficulties occasioned by the scarcity of water in the Rio Grande from the point where it serves as the boundary between Mexico and the United States of America.

The Mexican Government, to which the United States minister in Mexico communicated the aforesaid resolution in pursuance of the instructions of his Government, authorized me to take steps here to secure the arrangement proposed in the resolution, and I so informed the Department of State in a note dated October 26, 1893. It has not, however, thus far been possible to make much progress in this matter.

The Government of Mexico thinks that according to article 7 of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo of February 2, 1848, the inhabitants of one country can not, without the consent of the other, build any works that obstruct or impede navigation in international rivers, and nothing could impede it more absolutely than works which wholly turn aside the water of those rivers. It is true that article 4 of the treaty of Mesilla of December 30, 1853, annulled article 7 of the treaty of Guadalupe-Hidalgo, but at the same time it left its stipulations in force, as far as the Rio Grande is concerned, from the point where that river begins to be the boundary line between the two countries, and, moreover, by article 5 of the convention of November 12, 1884, the right of both countries to that river was again recognized, and it was again stipulated that one could not construct any works that obstructed navigation therein without the consent of the other.

From a report of the Assistant Quartermaster General addressed to the general in chief of the United States Army and dated Brazos de Santiago, Tex., September 5, 1850, it appears that Capt. Lowe, United States Army, ascended it with a vessel, reaching a point several kilometers above Paso del Norte, which shows that it was navigable at that point.

Still even supposing, without admitting it, that the Mexican Government's interpretation of the treaties were not well founded, and even if there were no stipulation on this subject between the two countries the principles of international law would form a sufficient basis for the rights of the Mexican inhabitants of the bank of the Rio Grande. Their claim to the use of the water of that river is incontestable, being prior to that of the inhabitants of Colorado by hundreds of years, and, according to the principles of civil law, a prior claim takes precedence in case of dispute.

The circumstance that that river serves as the boundary between the two countries, and that it is consequently an international river, gives it a special character which considerably restricts the freedom and rights of the inhabitants of both banks and does not permit them to construct works that reduce the volume of water in the river to such an extent that it is no longer navigable and even at last is dried up entirely.

I should fear to cast a reflection upon your knowledge of such matters if I were to quote the various doctrines laid down by writers on international law which are applicable to the present case and which support my asseverations.

These considerations and the terrible situation in which the inhabitants of Paso del Norte and the neighboring districts now are render the Government of Mexico exceedingly desirous to conclude an arrangement with that of the United States on this subject as speedily as may be possible; and I therefore repeat the request which I have verbally made on several occasions, viz, that the antecedents may be examined and that the necessary steps may be taken to effect an arrangement with the Government of Mexico that will facilitate the fulfillment of international obligations and remedy existing evils as far as possible.

Be pleased to accept, etc.

M. ROMERO.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
WEATHER BUREAU, OFFICE OF OBSERVER,

N. D. LANE, Observer.

M. COVARRUBIAS.

Mr. THOMAS. Suffice it to say that, so far as I am advised, this is the first official complaint made by the Republic of Mexico to the Government of the United States based upon the alleged unlawful use of water by citizens of the United States in the Rio Grande Valley above the point where it becomes an international boundary, except that the document itself refers to some previous communications on the same subject.

This letter calls attention to the location of Paso del Norte; to the fact that it has been in existence for something over 300 years; to the arid nature of the climate; to the necessity for the use of all water that can be secured from the river, especially during dry seasons, and the fact that a great many trenches have been dug in the State of Colorado, especially in San Luis Valley and Territory of New Mexico, by means of which water was diverted to such an extent that there was nothing left for the Mexican users of water when the dry season—the summer season—arrived.

He refers to the fact that this state of things would naturally reduce the price of land which was good at that time to an extremely low figure, and would diminish the population of the region very considerably.

He then directs the attention of the Secretary to the fact that the United States Congress recognized a serious injury suffered by the Mexicans in the concurrent resolution of April 29, 1890, which I have read, and which does nothing of the kind. It then declares that the Government of Mexico thinks that according to article 7 of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, of February 2, 1848, the inhabitants of one country can not, without the consent of the other, build any works that obstruct or impede navigation in international rivers—there is where this sinister word is for the first time found in the history of this transaction—and nothing could impede it more absolutely than works which wholly turn aside the water of those rivers. It is true that article 4 of the treaty of Mesilla, of December 30, 1853, annulled article 7 of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, but at the same time it left its stipulations in force, as far as the Rio Grande is concerned, from the point where that river begins to be the boundary line between the two countries, and so forth.

He then calls attention to a report of the Assistant Quartermaster General addressed to the General in Chief of the United States Army, and dated Brazos de Santiago, Tex., September 5, 1850, from which it appears that Capt. Lowe, United States Army, ascended it with a vessel, reaching a point several kilometers above Paso del Norte, which shows that it was navigable at that time. He then proceeds:

> Still, even supposing, without admitting it, that the Mexican Government's interpretation of the treaties were not well founded, and even if there were no stipulation on this subject between the two countries, the principles of international law would form a sufficient basis for the rights of the Mexican inhabitants of the bank of the Rio Grande. Their claim to the use of the water of that river is incontestable, being prior to that of the inhabitants of Colorado by hundreds of years, and, according to the principles of civil law, a prior claim takes precedence in case of dispute.

> I should fear to cast a reflection upon your knowledge of such matters if I were to quote the various doctrines laid down by writers on international law which are applicable to the present case and which support my asseverations.
> These considerations, and the terrible situation in which the inhabitants of Paso del Norte and the neighboring districts now are, render the Government of Mexico exceedingly desirous to conclude an arrangement with that of the United States on this subject as speedily as may be possible.

On the 5th of November following the Secretary of State addressed a communication based upon that of the Mexican minister to the Attorney General of the United States, who was at that time the Hon. Judson Harmon. He quotes the concurrent resolution of April 29, 1890, and then continues—the letter is very short—

> The negotiations with which the President, acting through the Department of State, is charged by the foregoing resolution can not be intelligently conducted unless the legal rights and obligations of the two Governments concerned and the responsibility of either, if any, for the disastrous state of things depicted in the Mexican minister's letter are first ascertained.

He then asks two questions of the legal adviser of the United States Government:

> (1) Are the provisions of article 7 of the treaty of February 2, 1848, known as the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, still in force so far as the River Rio Grande is concerned, either because never annulled or because recognized and reaffirmed by article 5 of the convention between the United States and Mexico of November 12, 1884?
> (2) By the principles of international law, independent of any special treaty or convention, may Mexico rightfully claim that the obstructions and diversions of the waters of the Rio Grande in the Mexican minister's note referred to are violations of its rights which should not continue for the future and on account of which, so far as the past is concerned, Mexico should be awarded adequate indemnity?

On the 12th of December following the Attorney General gave his opinion, based, of course, upon these two propositions, which exhaustively, conclusively, and unanswerably refuted the position taken by the Mexican minister and which should have terminated the entire so-called controversy; yet, strange to say, from the good hour that it was delivered to the Secretary of State up to the time the treaty was signed it was never so much as even referred to by a single official of the Government of the United States; it was ignored absolutely, and must therefore have been ignored intentionally. What sinister purpose was sufficiently powerful, what motive was sufficiently strong not only to divert attention from this great opinion, but to ignore it altogether, I do not, Mr. President, pretend to say. I can only determine from what took place and state an inference at the proper time. This opinion is so conclusive that, although it is of some length, I deem it important to insert it in the RECORD as a part of my remarks and I therefore ask the Secretary to read it into the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The SECRETARY. Reading from the message of the President of the United States of February 14, 1903, Fifty-seventh Congress, second session:

ITEM 3.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL TO THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, D. C., December 12, 1895.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 5th ultimo in which you refer to the concurrent resolution of Congress passed April 29, 1890, providing for negotiations with the Government of Mexico with a view to the remedy of certain difficulties mentioned in the preamble of such resolution, which arise from the taking of water for irrigation from the Rio Grande above the point where it ceases to be entirely within the United States and becomes the boundary between the United States and Mexico. I have also the copy which you inclose of the note of the Mexican minister to yourself, dated October 21, 1895, in which he states at length the position taken by his Government.

You say:

"The negotiations with which the President, acting through the Department of State, is charged by the foregoing resolution can not be intelligently conducted unless the legal rights and obligations of the two Governments concerned and the responsibility of either, if any, for the disastrous state of things depicted in the Mexican minister's letter are first ascertained."

I have the honor, therefore, to call your attention to the legal propositions asserted in Mr. Romero's letter and to inquire whether, in your judgment, those propositions correctly state the law applicable to the case. In other words—

(1) Are the provisions of article 7 of the treaty of February 2, 1848, known as the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, still in force so far as the River Rio Grande is concerned, either because never annulled or because recognized and reaffirmed by article 5 of the convention between the United States and Mexico of November 12, 1884?

(2) By the principles of international law, independent of any special treaty or convention, may Mexico rightfully claim that the obstructions and diversions of the waters of the Rio Grande in the Mexican minister's note referred to are violations of its rights which should not continue for the future and on account of which, so far as the past is concerned, Mexico should be awarded adequate indemnity?

I reply as follows:

"(1) Article 7 of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, while it was declared to have been rendered nugatory for the most part by the first clause of article 4 of the treaty concluded December 30, 1853, and proclaimed June 30, 1854, was, by the second clause thereof, reaffirmed as to the Rio Grande (nom. Rio Bravo del Norte) below the point where, by the lines as fixed by the latter treaty, that river became the boundary between the two countries. Said article 7 is recognized as still in force by article 5 of the convention concluded November 12, 1884, and proclaimed September 14, 1886.

"So far, therefore, as it affects the subject now in hand, said article 7, in my opinion, is still in force. I am unable, however, to agree with the minister in the interpretation which he gives it.

"His statement is that the city of El Paso del Norte has existed for more than 300 years, during almost all of which time its people have enjoyed the use of the water of the Rio Grande for the irrigation of their lands. As that city and the districts within its jurisdiction did not need more than 20 cubic meters of water per second, which was an almost infinitesimal portion of the volume of water, even in times of severest drought, they had sufficient water for their crops until about 10 years ago, when a great many trenches were dug in Colorado, especially in the St. Louis Valley and in New Mexico, through which the upper Rio Grande and its affluents flow, so greatly diminishing the water in the river at El Paso that except when rains happen to be abundant there is scarcity of water from the middle of June until March. In 1894 the river was entirely dry by June 15, so that no crops could be raised, and even fruit trees began to wither. The result has been to reduce the price of land and cause great hardships to the people, whose numbers in Paso del Norte, Zaragoza, Tres Jacalles, Guadalupe, and San Ignacio diminished from 20,000 in 1875 to one-half that number in 1894.

"The minister further states that from a report of the assistant quartermaster general, addressed to the general in chief of the United States Army, dated September 5, 1850, it appears that Capt. Lowe (meaning Love), United States Army, ascended the river in a vessel to a point several kilometers above Paso del Norte, showing that it was then navigable at that place. The minister has been misinformed. The original report, which is before me now, shows that Capt. Love was instructed to carry 'to the highest attainable point in the Rio Grande' his small keel boat, which 'drew, with her crew, provisions, arms, etc., on board, 18 inches of water.' He found this point at some 'impossible falls' which he names 'Brookes Falls.' Carrying around them 'the skiff which had accompanied his boat,' he rowed 47 miles farther to other falls, which he named 'Babbitts Falls.' Beyond this point he 'found it impossible to proceed with the skiff, either by land or water,' and it was 'about 150 miles by land below El Paso.'

"The minister contends that the irrigation ditches in Colorado and New Mexico, which result in diminishing the flow of water at El Paso, come within the treaty prohibitions of 'any work that may impede or interrupt, in whole or in part, the exercise of this right' (of navigation), because, as he says, 'nothing could impede it more absolutely than works which wholly turn aside the water of these rivers.' But Article VII is limited in terms to 'the part of the Rio Bravo del Norte lying below the southern boundary of New Mexico.' Article IV of the treaty of 1853 continues the provisions of said Article VII in force 'only so far as regards the Rio Bravo del Norte below the initial of said boundary provided in the first article of this treaty.' It is that part alone which is made free and common to the navigation of both countries and to which the various prohibitions apply. It is plain that neither party could have had, in framing these restrictions, any such intention as that now suggested. The fact, if such it were, that the parties did not think of the possibility of such acts as those now complained of would not operate to restrain language sufficiently broad to include them; but the terms used in the treaty are not fairly capable of such a construction. They naturally apply only to the part of the river with which the parties were dealing and to such works alone as either party might construct on its own side if not restrained. Though equally divided, in theory, between the two nations where it is their boundary, the river is, in fact, a unit for purposes of navigation, and therefore the treaty required the consent of both for the construction of 'any work that may impede or interrupt' navigation, even though it should be 'for the purpose of favoring new methods of navigation.' (Art. VII.) Up to the head of navigation no such work could have been constructed save by one of the two Governments, or by its authority. The prohibition was, therefore, appropriately made applicable to them alone and not to the citizens of either. 'neither shall, without consent of the other, construct,' etc. Above the head of navigation, where the river would be wholly within the United States, different rules would apply and private rights exist which the Government could not control or take away save by exercise of the power of eminent domain, so that clear and explicit language would be required to impose upon the United States such obligations as would result from the construction of the treaty now suggested.

"Moreover, the only right the treaty professed to create or protect with respect to the Rio Grande was that of navigation. The claim now made is for injuries to agriculture alone at places far above the head of navigation. Capt. Love, in the report referred to, said, 'The mouth of Devils River, which is about 100 miles below the mouth of the Puerco (Pecos) and 617 above Ringgold Barracks, is the head of steamboat navigation,' and that 'with some difficulty' navigation by keel boats was possible 'to a point 56 miles above the "Grand Indian Crossing," or about 283 miles above the mouth of Devils River.' So far as appears, the large and numerous tributaries below El Paso supply a sufficient volume of water for the needs of navigation.

"In fact, the part of the treaty now under consideration merely expresses substantially the same rights and duties which international law would imply from the fixing of the middle of the river as the boundary, viz, free navigation of the entire stream below the point where it becomes common to both nations, without any levy or exaction or the construction of any work which might impede or interrupt navigation, without the consent of both.

"In my opinion, therefore, the claim now made by Mexico finds no support in the treaty. On the contrary, the treaty affords an effective answer to the claim by the well-known rule that the expression of certain rights and obligations in an agreement implies the exclusion of all others with relation to the same subject.

"It is not necessary, in order to bring this principle into play, that it shall appear that either party, or both, actually thought of the particular matter whose exclusion is asserted, although that fact, when it appears, may serve to emphasize the inference. I am not advised whether the subject of the use of the water of the Rio Grande for irrigation was mentioned during the negotiations or not, but it is stated that such use had long been made by the Mexicans, and it was known that agriculture could not be carried on in that region without it. It was known, too, certainly to Mexico, that this necessity existed also throughout the entire region watered by the upper Rio Grande and its tributaries, for, as a province of Spain and then as an independent nation, Mexico had included both New Mexico and Colorado, and from the independence of Texas in 1836 down to the treaty of 1848 Mexico's eastern boundary was the Rio Grande to its source. By this treaty Mexico ceded to the United States the territory west of the Rio Grande and north of the southern boundary of New Mexico, just as she had abandoned to Texas all the territory east of that river, without any reservations, restrictions, or stipulations concerning the river except those above mentioned.

"Settlements had long existed in the region of Santa Fe, and the probability of the ultimate settlement of the entire territory along the Rio Grande must have been apparent to both parties. Yet the treaty made no attempt to create or reserve to Mexico or her citizens any rights or to impose on the United States or their citizens any restraints with respect to the use of water for irrigation, although rights of property in the territory were secured to all Mexicans, whether established there or not. (Art. 8.)

"The treaty of 1848 was a treaty of peace, and a different rule for the construction of such treaties is laid down by some writers. (Vattel, Law of Nations, Chitty's ed., p. 433.) If it be suggested that the circumstances under which this treaty was made bring its terms, as against the United States, within the operation of such rule, it is a sufficient answer that, even if the existence of the rule be acknowledged, it simply subjects provisions in favor of the United States to strict construction. Like all rules of construction, it has no application except in cases of doubtful meaning of language used and can not be made the means of introducing new terms. Moreover, the United States paid $15,000,000 for the territory acquired by the treaty (art. 12), and by the treaty of 1853, which was not a treaty of peace, Mexico ceded further territory in consideration of $10,000,000 (art. 3), repeating without enlarging the stipulations of the former treaty as to rights on the Rio Grande.

"(2) I have given my opinion of the construction and effect of the treaty, because it is responsive to your general request, though not to your specific questions. That opinion, perhaps, in strictness makes it unnecessary for me to consider your second question, but as that question is not put alternatively or conditionally, I proceed.

"An extended search affords no precedent or authority which has a direct bearing.

"There have been disputes about the rights of navigation of international rivers, but they have been settled by treaty. (For a list of such treaties see Heffter, Droit Int., Appendix VIII.) The subject is fully discussed by Hall (Int. Law, sec. 39), who denies that the people on the upper part of a navigable river have a natural right to pass over it through foreign territory to its mouth. But if such right be conceded, no aid is afforded for the present inquiry, because use for navigation, being common, would not curtail use by the proprietary country, while in the case now presented, there not being enough water for irrigation in both countries, the question is which shall yield to the other.

"It is stated by some authors that an obligation rests upon every country to receive streams which naturally flow into it from other countries, and they refer to this as a natural international servitude. (Heffter, Droit Int., sec. 43; 1 Phillemore, Int. Law, p. 303.) Others deny the existence of all international servitudes apart from agreement in some form. (Letters of Grotius quoted 2 Hert., p. 106; Kluber, Droit des Gens Moderne, sec. 139; Bluntschli, Droit Int. Cod.; Woolsey's Int. Law, sec. 58; 1 Calvo, Droit Int., sec. 556.)

"Such a servitude, however, if its existence be conceded, would not cover the present case or afford any real analogy to it. The servient country may not obstruct the stream so as to cause the water to back up and overflow the territories of the other. The dominant country may not divert the course of the stream so as to throw it upon the territory of the other at a different place. (See authorities supra.) In either of such cases there would be a direct invasion and injury by one of the nations of the territory of the other. But when the use of water by the inhabitants of the upper country results in reducing the volume which enters the other, it is a diminution of the servitude. The injury now complained of is a remote and indirect consequence of acts which operate as a deprivation by prior enjoyment. So it is evident that what is really contended for is a servitude which makes the lower country dominant and subjects the upper country to the burden of arresting its development and denying to its inhabitants the use of a provision which nature has supplied entirely within its own territory.

"Such a consequence of the doctrine of international servitude is not within the language used by any writer with whose works I am familiar, and could not have been within the range of his thought without finding expression.

"Both the common and the civil law undertake to regulate the use of the water of navigable streams by the different persons entitled to it. Neither has fixed any absolute rule, but leaves each case to be decided upon its own circumstances. But I need not enter upon a discussion of the rules and principles of either system in this regard, because both are municipal and, especially as they relate to real property, can have no operation beyond national boundaries. (Creasy, Int. Law, p. 164.) So they can only settle rights of citizens of the same country inter sese. The question must, therefore, be determined by consider-tions different from those which would apply between individual citizens of either country. Even if such a question could arise as a private one between citizens of one country and those of another, it is not so presented here. The mere assertion of the claim by Mexico would make it a national one, even if it were of a private nature. (Gray v. U. S., 1 C. Cls. R., 391–392.) But the use of water complained of and the resulting injuries are general throughout extended regions, so that effects upon individual rights can not be traced to individual causes, and the claim is by one nation against the other in fact as well as form.

"The fundamental principle of international law is the absolute sovereignty of every nation as against all others within its own territory. Of the nature and scope of sovereignty with respect to judicial jurisdiction, which is one of its elements, Chief Justice Marshall said (Schooner Exchange v. McFaddon, 7 Cranch, p. 136):

"'The jurisdiction of the nation within its own territory is necessarily exclusive and absolute. It is susceptible of no limitation not imposed by itself. Any restriction upon it, deriving validity from an external source, would imply a diminution of its sovereignty to the extent of the restriction, and an investment of that sovereignty to the same extent in that power which could impose such restriction.

"'All exceptions, therefore, to the full and complete power of a nation within its own territories must be traced up to the consent of the nation itself. They can flow from no other legitimate source.'

"It would be entirely useless to multiply authorities. So strongly is the principle of general and absolute sovereignty maintained that it has even been asserted by high authority that admitted international servitudes cease when they conflict with the necessities of the servient State. (Bluntschli, p. 212; see criticism by Creasy, p. 258.) Whether this be true or not, its assertion serves to emphasize the truth that self-preservation is one of the first laws of nations. No believer in the doctrine of natural servitudes has ever suggested one which would interfere with the enjoyment by a nation within its own territory of whatever was necessary to the development of its resources or the comfort of its people.

"The immediate as well as the possible consequences of the right asserted by Mexico show that its recognition is entirely inconsistent with the sovereignty of the United States over its national domain. Apart from the sum demanded by way of indemnity for the past, the claim involves not only the arrest of further settlement and development of large regions of the country, but the abandonment, in great measure at least, of what has already been accomplished.

"It is well known that the clearing and settlement of a wooded country affects the flow of streams, making it not only generally less, but also subjecting it to more sudden fluctuations between greater extremes, thereby exposing inhabitants on their banks to increase of the double danger of drought and flood. The principle now asserted might lead to consequences, in other cases, which need only be suggested.

"It will be remembered that a large part of the territory in question was public domain of Mexico, and was ceded as such to the United States, so that their proprietary as well as their sovereign rights are involved.

"It is not suggested that the injuries complained of are or have been in any measure due to wantonness or wastefulness in the use of water, or to any design or intention to injure. The water is simply insufficient to supply the needs of the great stretch of arid country through which the river, never large in the dry season, flows, giving much and receiving little.

"The case presented is a novel one. Whether the circumstances make it possible or proper to take any action from considerations of comity is a question which does not pertain to this department; but that question should be decided as one of policy only, because, in my opinion, the rules, principles, and precedents of international law impose no liability or obligation upon the United States."

"Very respectfully,

"JUDSON HARMON, Attorney General."

Mr. THOMAS. I have said, Mr. President, that this opinion, exhaustive and conclusive, should have terminated the entire claim and all pretense of its attempted enforcement, but it does not seem to have in the slightest degree affected the views and the purposes of those in authority, and finds no place in the subsequent history of this proceeding.

On the 26th day of February, 1898, the Senate passed a resolution requesting the President, if not incompatible with the public interest, to transmit to the Senate all of the proceedings relating to this subject. On the 7th day of April, 1898, the President responded by laying before the Senate the proceedings, which, of course, were prepared by the State Department in pursuance of that request. It is significant that that Document No. 229 of the Fifty-fifth Congress, second session, which is the response of the President of the United States to the Senate resolution, begins with the document dated the 4th day of August, 1896, eight months after this opinion was rendered, and, of course, makes no mention of it; but the activities of those behind the scheme increased, evidently with the participation of the Secretary of State.

I agreed, in view of the extension of my time, to suspend my remarks when the hour of 3 o'clock had arrived. That hour is now here, and I therefore yield the floor, and give notice that at the conclusion of the routine business to-morrow I shall continue my remarks upon this subject.

THE REPUBLIC COAL CO.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 41) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to sell or lease certain public lands to the Republic Coal Co., a corporation.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I understand that the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] desires to go on and finish the consideration of Senate joint resolution No. 41, which was before the Senate when we adjourned on Saturday, and which appears upon the face of the calendar as unfinished business. The joint resolution which is being pressed by the Senator from Montana is, in my opinion, one that will not require any great length of time, and I think it proper, when the joint resolution has come up for discussion upon its merits, that it should be disposed of.

I am not now going to attempt to prevent the consideration and final disposition of that measure, but I am going to make a proposition to the Chair; and while I shall not ask the Chair to rule on it at this time, because it is not necessary to rule on it at this time, I shall nevertheless present it, and it may possibly require a ruling at a future time. It is this proposition:

When unfinished business is temporarily laid aside by unanimous consent of the Senate, any intervening bill, whether finished or unfinished that day, or any number of intervening bills, so long as the unfinished business is temporarily laid aside, do not displace the unfinished business; but the unfinished business will come up automatically after 2 o'clock on each day as a result of merely asking for the regular order.

When this matter was under discussion on Saturday, and the present occupant of the chair was not in the chair, there seemed to be some difference of opinion as to what the rule would be. I am not unmindful of the suggestion made by the present occupant of the chair upon that point, and I think that at one time it was undoubtedly the rule of the Senate. For a number of years, however—and I have a precedent upon that subject—it has been held that where the unfinished business is temporarily laid aside by unanimous consent the word "temporarily" means that it is to be laid aside only until it is called up in its regular order after 2 o'clock of any day, and that the number of bills or the number of days that intervene while it is temporarily laid aside will not affect its status.

I wish at this time, if the Chair will permit me, to read a decision upon that point made by the Senate in 1912. We had under consideration a bill (H. R. 18642) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes":

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

So this, I presume, was after 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Senator from Idaho will proceed.

Then the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] finished an address he was making upon another bill. That matter was disposed of, and then the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] made this motion:

Mr. BRISTOW. I ask that the Senate take up Senate bill 2234, in relation to presidential primaries in the District of Columbia.

There was a call then for a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

I presented this same question then, Mr. President:

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. At the conclusion of the morning business the Senate had under consideration a subject; and I ask whether or not the unfinished business was then temporarily laid aside by unanimous consent? My understanding is that when the unfinished business is laid aside temporarily, the word "temporarily" means until the matter then before the Senate has been disposed of, and the question is, Whether immediately thereafter it does not come before the Senate without any further motion, or whether a motion made at this time to take up another subject will not in fact, if agreed to, make that subject the unfinished business? Therefore, presenting the matter as it now appears before the Senate, I ask, if the motion of the Senator from Kansas is carried, will not the subject matter as to which the motion is made become the unfinished business in place of the present unfinished business?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the opinion of the Chair it will not. In the opinion of the Chair, when the unfinished business is temporarily laid aside it loses its place for that day as unfinished business unless taken up on motion—

That is, for that day only—

A Senator can at any time move to proceed to the consideration of a bill.

Then Mr. Bacon, who was certainly regarded as a very good authority, speaks upon the subject:

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, of course I do not wish to unnecessarily differ from the Chair, but, as the Chair gave no opportunity for an expression before ruling, I hope I may be indulged to say that I very gravely doubt if that would be a safe rule to pursue. I think the suggestion of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] correctly presents the rule, and that is, that when the unfinished business is temporarily laid aside, if it is done in the interest of another matter then pending, it would be immediately in order thereafter. At the very outside I should say that it would not go to the extent suggested by the Chair, but that on a call for the regular order it would certainly resume its place as the unfinished business; and temporarily laying it aside does not displace it. As I understand the ruling of the Chair, it was that being temporarily laid aside a measure lost its place.

I do not think it lost anything, Mr. President. It may be that the rule would not go to the extent suggested by the Senator from North Dakota, that the unfinished business would come up automatically upon the conclusion of any particular measure which might have engaged the attention of the Senate, but I have not the shadow of a doubt that it is the regular order at all times, even when temporarily laid aside, and that when temporarily laid aside the matter which shall then engage the attention of the Senate would be displaced by a call for the regular order at any time.

I simply desire to call attention here to the fact that I called for the regular order in asking that my bill be presented again before the Senate.

Senator Bacon resumes:

It would be a dangerous rule, Mr. President, that the unfinished business lost its place under such circumstances. It can not lose its place until it has been supplanted or displaced, and a call for the regular order at any time, I respectfully suggest for the consideration of the Chair, would restore it. Temporarily laying aside the unfinished business does not give the matter which has been temporarily taken up any right whatever except subject to the superior right of the regular order, which is the unfinished business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The regular order was not demanded, the Chair will say.

Mr. BACON. I understood that, but I was a little troubled, if the Chair will pardon the suggestion, by the ruling that the unfinished business was displaced for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In case the motion to proceed to the consideration of another bill is carried.

Mr. BACON. Well, I think, Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will submit the matter to the Senate. The Chair has no fixed views upon the subject that could not be changed by the citation of authorities.

Mr. BRISTOW. I understand the point of order is that if the motion which I made prevails it displaces the unfinished business. I do not understand that the Senator from Georgia contends that it does. The motion can carry and the unfinished business may still retain its right. So we can go ahead, as we did the other day, and dispose of this bill and take up something else, and the unfinished business is laid aside until it is called up; so that the motion I have made does not in any way interfere with the unfinished business, because it has been laid aside.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I think it extremely important that the regular proceedings of the Senate should be definitely known and understood and observed with care; and I would suggest to the Senator that it would be better if he made a motion to the effect that, in the absence of a call for the regular order, the Senate now consider such-and-such a bill.

Mr. BRISTOW. The reason I made the motion that I did was that it follows the exact precedent of a motion that was made, I think, on Friday last, when we took up a bill upon motion after the unfinished business had been laid aside, and proceeded to its consideration and the disposition of it. The motion is in exact accord with the ruling of the Chair at that time. I think it occurred in Friday's proceedings, as the Senator from Georgia doubtless remembers.

Mr. BACON. Well, Mr. President, as I was proceeding to say, if it appeared that there was no disposition to displace the unfinished business and the Senator had asked that the Senate devote the remainder of the day to such a matter, that would be all right; but a simple motion to proceed to the consideration of a certain bill always makes it the unfinished business. That is the general rule. Now, the question is, whether this comes under an exception.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President, the particular point upon which I desired the ruling of the Chair was whether or not, automatically, after the disposition of the business which temporarily displaced the unfinished business, the latter would come up again before the Senate. If I understand the word "temporarily," as used in a request for unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside, that word means until the matter that is being discussed is disposed of. Then the unfinished business comes up automatically and does not require a motion. I can see very easily that if some one follows it by another motion or another request for unanimous consent that some other matter may be considered, the Chair could well hold that the granting of unanimous consent in that respect would be equivalent to unanimous consent to further lay aside the unfinished business; but when we do not ask that the unfinished business be further temporarily laid aside, but proceed to the consideration of other business upon motion, and not by unanimous consent, it seems to me, logically, that it would displace the unfinished business.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the motion of the Senator from Kansas, it seems to me, is proper, unless those who are opposing it desire to bring the unfinished business before the Senate, which they can do; but they have not done so. The unfinished business is not before the Senate unless somebody calls for the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Idaho that, in the opinion of the Chair, the unfinished business, which has been temporarily laid aside by unanimous consent, would automatically come before the Senate provided a motion had not intervened. Now, the Senator from Kansas moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of another matter, and the question is, of course, whether or not that motion is now in order. The Chair thinks it is; but if any Senator so desires, the Chair will submit it to the Senate so that the Senate may vote upon it. In the absence of such request, the Chair will rule that the motion of the Senator from Kansas is in order.

In other words, that we could still proceed to take up any other matter, but not that it laid aside the unfinished business.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I think the motion is in order; but I think the more serious question that Senators have in mind is as to what effect it will have on the unfinished business. It seems to me now, with the unfinished business the regular order, that if we take up by vote at this hour another matter, it will displace the unfinished business; and those who are interested in the unfinished business, which is the metal-schedule bill, retaining its place, might well be on the alert.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of the opinion that, where the unfinished business is temporarily laid aside by unanimous consent and the Senate proceeds to take up another matter, the unfinished business is not displaced thereby; but the Chair will submit that question to the Senate if any Senator desires the Chair to do so.

Then, further on:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the motion of the Senator from Kansas prevails, it will be for the Senate to decide what the effect of it has been—whether or not the unfinished business has been thereby displaced.

Then the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], who also spoke upon this matter and cited a point that was decided by Senator Frye, said:

Manifestly, Mr. President, even if this matter were taken up by a vote, the unfinished business could be called up after that upon demand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is as the Chair understands. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kansas that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill named by him. [Putting the question.] By the sound the "noes" seem to have it.

The motion of the Senator from Kansas was lost, Mr. President; but the opinion of the Chair at that time—and that is what I have understood to be the opinion right along since that time—was that temporarily laying aside a bill would not displace it, even though one or two days or any number of days might pass, as all that would come subsequently to it would be subject to its right to be called up within the proper hour for calling up the unfinished business.

I am not raising this question now, because I consent that what I regard as the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside; but I may be forced to ask for a ruling upon the question when it shall properly come before the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. May the Chair inquire whether these precedents have been cited with reference to the ruling of the Chair upon the bill which the Senator had before the Senate?

Mr. MCCUMBER. No, Mr. President; they were not cited.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, it is perhaps out of place to discuss a prospective point of order at this time, when the point of order has not been made; but inasmuch as the Senator from North Dakota has seen fit to bring up this matter at this time in this form I wish to call the attention of the President of the Senate to the distinction of the rule.

The rule is this, and this has been the practice of the Senate: When a request is made to lay aside temporarily a pending bill for the consideration of another bill, and the other bill is taken up by unanimous consent, the consideration of that bill does not displace the unfinished business; but it is otherwise if a motion is made. After the unfinished business has been temporarily laid aside, if a motion is made to take up another bill then the rule and the decision has been that that becomes, if it is undisposed of, the unfinished business; and if the authority that the Senator cites and quotes here is carefully read, the Chair will find that it sustains this view.

On the occasion referred to—April 22, 1912—the Presiding Officer said to the Senator from Idaho:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Idaho that, in the opinion of the Chair, the unfinished business, which has been temporarily laid aside by unanimous consent, would automatically come before the Senate provided a motion had not intervened.

In the case of this joint resolution relating to the disposal of coal lands in Montana to the Milwaukee & St. Paul Co., or to a subsidiary company of that company, if I recall correctly—and if I am mistaken, the RECORD will show the fact—the request was to proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution by unanimous consent. That request was objected to, and then a motion was made. That makes all the difference in the world. If a motion is made to take up another measure, it displaces the unfinished business.

At the time the discussion was pending to which the Senator from North Dakota has referred, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] quoted a decision from the precedents of the Senate, to this effect:

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if I read correctly, on page 439 of the Precedents of the Senate, we have a ruling that would seem to settle this matter:

"The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Chandler in the chair) announced that the hour of 1 o'clock had arrived, and laid before the Senate its unfinished business, viz, the bill (H. R. 3717) to make oleomargarine and other imitation dairy products subject to the laws of the State or Territory into which they are transported, and to change the tax on oleomargarine.

"When, Mr. Morgan raised a question of order, viz, that the bill having been displaced by a motion to consider other matter on the previous day prior to adjournment, therefore possessed no priority as unfinished business, and requested that the bill standing first on the order of special orders, viz, the bill (H. R. 2538) to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, be now laid before the Senate."

That was the unfinished business—

"The PRESIDENT pro tempore (Mr. Frye) having resumed the chair, sustained the question of order and laid the special order before the Senate as its unfinished business."

There is a ruling by one of our presiding officers, Senator Frye, whom we all recognize as having been a very good and able parliamentarian. On Saturday evening, when this matter was up for discussion, the same questions were raised, and the same decision was adhered to by the Senator then in the chair.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator for a moment?

Mr. NELSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. WALSH. I have just been reading the precedent now referred to by the distinguished Senator from Minnesota. My understanding of that case was that the business under consideration was not temporarily laid aside, but it was absolutely displaced by a motion to take up another matter; and that other matter, being under consideration at the time of adjournment, became the unfinished business. Does the Senator think that presents a case that is altogether parallel?

Mr. NELSON. My understanding of the rule has been, and I think the precedents of the Senate will disclose it, so far as the question has been raised, that where under circumstances similar to those in this case the consideration of another bill was taken up by motion, and not by unanimous consent, it did displace the unfinished business.

Mr. WALSH. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Minnesota, then, whether after this, if the present rule is established, any of us will not give place at his peril to anybody who may request that a matter be temporarily laid aside for the consideration of other business?

Mr. NELSON. That may be so.

Mr. SMOOT. Not if it is by unanimous consent, however.

Mr. NELSON. Not by unanimous consent.

Mr. WALSH. No. But suppose the Senate has a certain bill under consideration, which I am urging and am desirous of having disposed of. Some one comes in and asks if I will not consent that it be temporarily laid aside in order that another matter may receive consideration. Out of a spirit of accommodation I reply, "Yes; I shall be glad to, if the matter will not take more than, say, half an hour." I am assured that it will not take more than half an hour and I give my consent. Then the matter is taken up and it goes on indefinitely. The debate is prolonged, as we find debates often are. Are we to understand that I can not take chances of that character any more, but that I must resolutely say: "I shall not give place at all, much as I should like to accommodate you, because if your matter should take the remainder of the afternoon the measure I have before the Senate will be displaced as unfinished business"? Is that the position in which the Senate is going to put itself?

Mr. NELSON. It depends upon how the other bill is taken up. If it is taken up by unanimous consent, if that is the proposition, it does not displace the unfinished business; but it is different where a motion is made to take it up.

Here is the point: When the unfinished business is temporarily laid aside and it is sought to bring up another bill in place of it by unanimous consent, if objection is made it requires a motion to take it up. If a motion is made and agreed to, it is my understanding that it always has been the practice to hold that that displaces the unfinished business.

Mr. WALSH. That is the matter I wanted to get clear in my mind. Suppose a Senator comes to me and asks if I will consent that the measure I am pressing shall be temporarily laid aside. He does not know that he will be able to get unanimous consent to take up his matter. He does not know what the Senate may do afterwards. I have observed that when an application is made to lay aside a bill temporarily you do not wait until you find out whether unanimous consent is going to be given to take up some other matter, or whether it will be necessary to resort to a motion; but heretofore the consent of the person in charge of the bill ordinarily has been given to lay it aside. I understand from the Senator now, however——

Mr. NELSON. Suppose in this case an objection had been made to taking up this Montana joint resolution by unanimous consent, and a motion had been made and the Senate had refused to take it up on motion. What then?

Mr. WALSH. But the first thing is to have temporarily laid aside the bill that is before the Senate. How are you going to do that? Now, having done that, the Senator who is in charge of it does not know whether the other matter will come up on unanimous consent or by a motion.

Mr. NELSON. A bill is temporarily laid aside not by motion, but by unanimous consent.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. NELSON. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I was going to say to the Senator from Montana that no Senator can give consent to the laying aside of any bill. It must be the unanimous consent of the Senate.

Mr. WALSH. I appreciate that.

Mr. SMOOT. If this case had been one where unanimous consent had been asked, there would be no question about it. The ruling of the Chair upon this particular case is plain, as the RECORD shows:

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is the Republic Coal Co. resolution.

Mr. MYERS. It is calendar No. 85, Senate joint resolution 41.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 41) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to sell or lease certain public lands to the Republic Coal Co., a corporation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. JONES. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Does the fact that the joint resolution of the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] has been taken up on motion displace the unfinished business?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It undoubtedly does.

Mr. SMOOT. That is, if the consideration of the joint resolution is not concluded before the adjournment of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the consideration of the joint resolution is not concluded before the adjournment of the Senate, it takes the place of the unfinished business under the rules of the Senate.

Mr. President, that has been the practice in this body for 10 years to my knowledge, and, as I understand, this question has never arisen in its present shape.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I can show that just exactly the same kind of a question has arisen almost daily and has been decided by the Chair again and again in another way. If the Senator from Utah and the Senator from Minnesota will allow me, I will call attention to the many cases.

For instance, it was customary a short time ago to call up pension bills at any time during the time we were considering unfinished business. Very often there is no one to speak on the unfinished business during the balance of the afternoon, and the Senator having charge of the unfinished business says: "I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside." Nothing else is said; nothing else is done. It is temporarily laid aside. Then, as chairman of the Committee on Pensions, I have moved again and again to proceed to take up the Pension Calendar or some other business, and the moment that was completed, if anyone called for the regular order, that put the unfinished business back in its place.

Mr. SMOOT. I say to the Senator now that he can not point to a single, solitary instance where a pension bill has displaced the unfinished business. When the pension bills were taken up it was absolutely known by the Senate that they would be finished before adjournment upon that day. I tell the Senator now that he can not point to one case where a pension bill ever displaced the unfinished business in this body.

Mr. McCUMBER. There is a reason for every rule, and I would ask the Senator what reason there would be for a difference in the two propositions. When, as was suggested by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], the unfinished business is temporarily laid aside it is then understood that the Senate will probably take up some other bill. The Senator asking for the unanimous consent to lay the bill aside can not determine what will come up after it, but it is temporarily laid aside. Then what reason is there for a difference, as in this case, whether unanimous consent is asked to get a particular bill up in the interim the unfinished business is temporarily laid aside or whether you get it up by a motion, as in this case, which was a unanimous vote in favor of taking it up? I certainly can not see any difference between them. The unfinished business has to go over from day to day until 2 o'clock. It can not come up except by unanimous consent before 2 o'clock. What reason is there in a rule that would say if we adjourn before the bill which was taken up in place of it was disposed of, then it should displace the unfinished business, and we did not adjourn before it was disposed of it should not displace it? There ought to be some reason for such a rule.

Mr. SMOOT. There is a reason, and I will state the reason, as I understand it. If the Senator having in charge the unfinished business requests at 2 o'clock that it be temporarily laid aside he can leave the Chamber knowing that it will not be displaced by asking unanimous consent for the consideration of any other business, but he knows that under the rules if other business is taken up on motion it will displace his unfinished business, and he also knows that if it is displaced it must be done by a vote of the Senate.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator is mistaken there. If there is a vote to displace it, it is true——

Mr. SMOOT. That would displace it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Just a moment, Mr. President. If it has already been displaced temporarily, then the vote taking up another bill is not a vote to displace it. It is a vote to take up something else during the time that the unfinished business is held in abeyance. How would it come up again if it is displaced? How does it come up the next day at 2 o'clock?

Mr. SMOOT. Temporarily laying the bill aside by unanimous consent does not displace it as unfinished business, but it does after 2 o'clock displace it if any other business is taken up on motion, because the Senate then says, "We want by a motion of the Senate to consider another measure," and if that measure is disposed of before the adjournment on that day, then the unfinished business is not interfered with at all.

Mr. BRANDEGEE and Mr. BRISTOW addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. NELSON. I will yield. I forget who is first in order. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I had forgotten that the Senator from Minnesota has the floor. I wanted to ask a question of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. NELSON. Very well; I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I will be very brief, as I do not wish to trespass upon the courtesy of the Senator from Minnesota. I simply want to refer to the suggestion made by the Senator from Utah that when a Senator in charge of a bill in the position which is called the unfinished business asks unanimous consent that it may be temporarily laid aside, he may then leave the Chamber with some confidence that the measure he is in charge of will not be displaced that afternoon at least, and yet the Senator from Utah in the next breath says that if a Senator does stand up under those very conditions and move that the Senate shall proceed to the consideration of another measure and that motion is carried, the unfinished business is displaced and has ceased to be the unfinished business. Where, then, is the reliance of a Senator in charge of a bill who has obtained unanimous consent that it be temporarily laid aside and has left the Senate with the assurance that it is safe in its position, if when he gets out of the door the Senate can proceed to something else and so displace it? Although the Senate had given unanimous consent that laying it aside was only temporary, immediately the Senate can violate the effect of the unanimous consent, according to the Senator, by proceeding to the consideration of another measure which in the last hour of the day absolutely displaces the unfinished business.

Mr. SMOOT. This is what I had in mind when I made that statement. When the unanimous consent is given, the Senator having in charge the unfinished business knows that the mere request for the consideration of any bill by unanimous consent will not displace it, but if there is a motion to take it up, any Senator here could demand the yeas and nays, he could ask for a division, he could send for the Senator having the unfinished business in charge, and it would not be displaced without a vote of the Senate. That is what I had in mind, if I did not say it before.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think the Senator did not say it before, and that he is now stating something that is quite different from what he said when I asked him the question. But I decline to trespass further on the time of the Senator from Minnesota. After he has concluded I shall in my own right make a brief observation.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from New Hampshire allow me to yield to the Senator from Kansas first?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. He rose when two other Senators were on the floor, and I could not give all three a chance at the same time.

Mr. BRISTOW. This is the question I wanted to propound to the Senator from Utah: If a motion to take up a pension bill, we will say, displaces the unfinished business so that it is no longer the unfinished business, how does it get back on the calendar as the unfinished business?

Mr. SMOOT. There was so much noise in the Chamber I could not hear what the Senator said.

Mr. BRISTOW. If taking up a bill—a pension bill, or any other kind of a bill—on motion after the unfinished business has been temporarily laid aside displaces it by taking it up on motion, how does the unfinished business get back on the calendar as the unfinished business?

Mr. SMOOT. It does not displace it if the bill is concluded before adjournment on that day.

Mr. BRISTOW. But the unfinished business is displaced, as I understand the Senator from Utah, because another bill is taken up on motion, not because the discussion lasts 1 hour or 10 hours, but the motion is what the Senator from Utah says displaces the unfinished business. If a motion displaces it, how do you get it back?

Mr. SMOOT. I distinctly stated that wherever a bill was taken up after 2 o'clock upon motion and was not concluded before adjournment on that day it displaces the unfinished business; and I called the attention of the Senator from North Dakota to the fact that the pension bills he referred to were concluded before adjournment on the day upon which they were considered, and, therefore, that did not displace the unfinished business.

Mr. BRISTOW. Let me inquire of the Senator, Is it the lapse of time, then, that displaces, and not the motion? Do I understand him correctly? It is the time in which the Senate is engaged in the consideration of a bill that displaces the unfinished business, and not the fact that it was taken up on motion?

Mr. SMOOT. You can take any measure that may be upon the calendar, and when there is no unfinished business on the calendar you can move at any time after 2 o'clock to take it up, and if the bill is taken up and is not disposed of before adjournment on that day it becomes the unfinished business.

Mr. BRISTOW. There is no difference of opinion between the Senator and myself on that point. But that is not the question I asked the Senator. I asked him whether it is the motion to take up a bill that displaces the unfinished business or the length of time in which the Senate considers the bill before the body.

Mr. SMOOT. Neither one altogether, but it is simply this: That whenever a measure is before the Senate and is not disposed of before adjournment on that day, whatever it may be, if it is before the Senate on motion it becomes the unfinished business. If it is before the Senate by unanimous consent it does not become the unfinished business.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator from Kansas that the controlling fact in my mind is that the joint resolution had been taken up by motion. The Senate proceeded with its consideration, and when the hour of adjournment arrived the joint resolution had not yet been disposed of. It is a pending measure. As the Senate by a vote has not displaced the joint resolution, it stands as the unfinished business, because the Senate has not disposed of the joint resolution that it has taken up by motion.

Mr. BRISTOW. Now, let me inquire; if the bill is taken up and is pending at the time of adjournment, we will say it is the unfinished business. Whether it is taken up by unanimous consent or whether it is taken up by motion, if it is not disposed of when the Senate adjourns it is the unfinished business. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. NELSON. Not if it is taken up by unanimous consent. You must take my whole statement together. My statement is that if a bill is taken up by motion and the consideration of it is proceeded with and it is not finished at the time of adjournment, that bill is still pending as the unfinished business before the Senate. After the Senate takes up a bill of that kind, when the hour of adjournment comes, if the Senate decide then to displace that bill and have it laid aside, that alters the case; but if the Senate should adjourn without disposing of the bill that they have by motion agreed to take up, that bill is still pending.

Mr. BRISTOW. Suppose by unanimous consent a Senator asks that a certain bill be taken up and it is taken up and its consideration is continued over the adjournment, does it not, by virtue of the adjournment before it is finished, become the unfinished business the next day?

Mr. NELSON. Nor necessarily. It is taken up by unanimous consent for that day, that is all. It is not a unanimous-consent agreement to make that bill the unfinished business; it is simply a unanimous-consent agreement to take the bill up for consideration, and the unanimous consent does not extend, unless it is so expressed, beyond that day. If unanimous consent is asked to take up a given bill and to proceed with the consideration of that bill until it is disposed of, and unanimous consent is given, then the bill is before the Senate; but there was no such request in this case.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will ask the Senator what becomes of the unanimous consent to lay aside the unfinished business temporarily when the Senate agrees unanimously that it is to be laid aside?

The VICE PRESIDENT. While this discussion is going on, may the Chair interject an inquiry, that there may be some additional light thrown upon this subject?

Mr. NELSON. I yield.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The RECORD shows—and I assume it all has to do with the ruling on the case of the bill which the Senator from North Dakota claims was the unfinished business—that upon motion that bill was taken up by the Senate. Not a thing was done; there was not a thing read from the bill, or an argument made, or an amendment presented, or a single thing done with it; but immediately it was laid aside, and the joint resolution was not taken up by unanimous consent, but taken up on motion. That the Chair may have the information on other subjects besides the unfinished business, the Chair would like to hear a discussion of the proposition as to whether a measure may become the unfinished business when nothing was done with it after it was taken up.

Mr. McCUMBER. May I answer the Chair right there?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Chair laid the unfinished business before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; the Chair laid no unfinished business before the Senate. The Chair laid the bill of the Senator from North Dakota before the Senate.

Mr. McCUMBER. But upon the arrival of 2 o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes; at 2 o'clock.

Mr. McCUMBER. I insist that laying the bill before the Senate on the arrival of 2 o'clock makes that bill the unfinished business, and it does not require one word to be said upon it at that time. It then has its place as the unfinished business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In other words, the view of the Senator from North Dakota is that the first thing laid before the Senate after 2 o'clock is the unfinished business rather than the last thing before adjournment. That is the view of the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; because the last thing was disposed of. The Chair in this case said:

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is Senate bill 120.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes; but that preceded the motion to reconsider. That was reconsidered and it went back on the calendar, and subsequently, on the motion of the Senator from North Dakota, it was laid before the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. NELSON. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. McCUMBER. After it was voted that the bill be made the unfinished business, then I asked unanimous consent that it be temporarily laid aside, and that was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair would like to hear discussion on that question also. The Chair does not believe that the Senate can make anything unfinished business by motion.

Mr. McCUMBER. While the Senator from New Hampshire is discussing that part of the question, I will turn to the RECORD and find the reference to the other part.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I think we are wasting a great deal of time unnecessarily in this controversy. I have been here for a long time and I never heard this question raised before, and I hope it will not be raised again.

I wish to ask the Senator from Montana what is the status of the joint resolution his colleague has in charge? How are we to get rid of that measure to-day, if the Senator pleases?

Mr. WALSH. Of course, I submit my own judgment with great humility in answer to the question of the Senator from New Hampshire, but my own judgment about the matter, gathered from a study of the rules and the brief experience I have had here, is that the Senator who has charge of the joint resolution consenting that it be temporarily laid aside would have the right to call it up at any time and displace any bill, because he has simply given way temporarily to the bill. The Senate may take up something else. So it can be displaced at any time, in my view.

Mr. GALLINGER. That means that the bill which the Senate has voted to proceed to the consideration of can be disposed of upon the request of a Senator who has charge of some other bill.

Mr. WALSH. Let me answer the Senator, because that Senator gave way simply for the consideration of other measures temporarily——

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator did not give way; the Senate gave way. The Senate temporarily laid the bill aside. If it is contended seriously that two Senators can occupy the attention of the Senate at the same time, each one in charge of a bill, I confess I have read the rules to very poor result. It is manifest, and I wonder that the Senator from North Dakota so persistently claims to the contrary, that the joint resolution the Senator from Montana has in charge is before the Senate, for the reason that it was under consideration at the time of adjournment, and it was placed before the Senate upon a motion. If that be not so, the Senator from Montana can now lay his joint resolution aside—or it is put aside in some way, I do not know how—the Senator from North Dakota can of his own motion call up his bill, and after a time he can yield again and let the Senator from Montana have another inning. As I said the other day, it would be plain battledore and shuttlecock with two bills here, which I submit, under the rules of the Senate, can not be done.

The Senator who asks to lay the bill aside can protect himself very readily. If the Senator from Montana asked unanimous consent and it was denied, the Senator from North Dakota could then ask that his bill be laid before the Senate again and prevent a motion to proceed to the consideration of any other bill. He has ample protection if he is watchful of his rights.

But, Mr. President, if it is to be decided that the Senator from North Dakota has now the right of his own motion to proceed to the consideration of his bill, I confess the rules of the Senate ought to be revised.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me a moment?

Mr. NELSON. I only want to say this to the Senator from North Dakota. I am sorry he started this discussion. I hope he will make it as short as possible. The Senator from Montana is anxious to have his joint resolution up. I hope he can get it up and have it disposed of. I am in favor of his measure. Therefore I hope the Senator will abstain as far as he can from further discussion of the point that is not now pending and let further discussion of it go over. I just make that suggestion to the Senator. If he wants to proceed, of course I yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will wait until the Senator gets through.

Mr. NELSON. I am through. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McCUMBER. Then I will take the floor in my own right and not in the Senator's time.

Mr. NELSON. There is nothing pending here.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I will first answer the suggestion of the Chair. So that the Chair may have the record I read:

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will be compelled to decide that under the rule a motion to take up a certain bill is not amendable. The question is, Will the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 120?

After some discussion, that was put to a vote, and it was carried, 32 to 26. Thereupon the Vice President said:

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion is agreed to, and the Chair lays before the Senate Senate bill 120, the title of which will be stated.

The Secretary then stated the title.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, for the purpose of allowing the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] to conclude the consideration of the joint resolution which he called up some time ago, and the consideration of which, I think, can be finished this afternoon, I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

And in time it was temporarily laid aside. I simply call the attention of the Chair to the fact that after this vote the Chair then laid the bill before the Senate again.

With the Chair's permission, I want to answer the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. The Senator from New Hampshire was not present when I called attention to his own discussion of this same kind of a situation in 1912. I quoted with approval the words of the Senator from New Hampshire at that time, when he said:

Manifestly, Mr. President, even if this matter were taken up by a vote, the unfinished business could be called up after that upon demand.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. That was the Senator's statement of his opinion on the same situation.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the consideration of the second bill taken up terminated before adjournment.

Mr. McCUMBER. No, Mr. President; that was not the question. I am not going over that again; but the question was the effect of the motion made by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW], and that was the conclusion of the Senator from New Hampshire upon the question.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I must be permitted to interpret my own language and my own view. I say I never have held that if a bill taken up on motion was not concluded before adjournment it did not become the unfinished business. I never held that view.

Mr. McCUMBER. I made my demand to take up the other before adjournment. I did everything that was in my power to protect myself.

Mr. GALLINGER. You did not get it up, and as a result the bill that was in charge of the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] became the unfinished business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. What is the further pleasure of the Senate?

Mr. MYERS. I call for the regular order. I ask that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is before the Senate. It came before the Senate an hour ago.

Mr. MYERS. The pending proposition, I believe, is the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA]. With the greatest respect to the Senator who offered the amendment, I hope the amendment will not prevail, because if we put in the joint resolution a provision to lease, I believe it would utterly destroy the measure; it would never get through the House. There is such determined opposition to leasing over there that some of the Members of the House, I am satisfied, would talk it to death or resort to any parliamentary expedient to kill it. If that amendment is adopted it simply means the death knell of the measure. It is a simple one. It merely authorizes the sale of several sections of land, at not less than the appraised price or at any price the Secretary of the Interior may fix. He could put a value of $10,000 an acre upon it if he wanted to do it. I hope the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. WEST. I wish to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. MYERS. I yield with great pleasure.

Mr. WEST. Do the terms of the joint resolution provide that this property shall be sold to a designated individual or company? I have not had the pleasure of reading it.

Mr. MYERS. Yes, sir; to the Republic Coal Co. at a price not less than the appraised value.

Mr. WEST. Why are the terms of the sale limited to that company alone?

Mr. MYERS. I will answer as briefly as I can. I made quite an extended statement about this measure on the floor of the Senate once before and it is all embodied in a report here which sets forth everything fully. I do not want to take up much time, but I will answer very briefly.

The Milwaukee Railroad is a great transcontinental railroad which is operated across the continent. It must have coal to run its trains. It is the only fuel which they can get or use. It must have fuel to transport its trains across the State of Montana. It runs within 50 miles of the Great Northern Pacific. When the Northern Pacific Railroad was constructed it was granted as a bonus a bounty by Congress of each alternate section of land within 50 miles of its track, whether it contained coal or not.

The Milwaukee Road was built without any subsidy or bonus many years later, and runs through the same territory. It is a competing line. The Northern Pacific owns each alternate section of coal land there and will not sell any coal to a competing line. It absolutely refuses to treat with it or deal with it or negotiate with it at all. Under the law the Milwaukee Road, or the Republic Coal Co., which is a subsidiary corporation of the Milwaukee Road, can not buy this land. The corporation can not buy it from the Government under the general law. An individual or an association of individuals can; but if they buy it and then sell it to this corporation, the courts have held that is prima facie evidence of fraud, and that the transfer must be set aside.

Now, then, the Government is in control of the Milwaukee road in a way. The Interstate Commerce Commission can regulate freight rates and say how much it shall charge for freight; it is obliged, in order to hold the franchise, to operate the trains, and is subject to the board of railroad commissioners of every State through which it runs. Only a few days ago the Montana Board of Railroad Commissioners issued an order compelling it to put in connection with another road. It is a public-service utility; it is under the control of the Government. Now it comes to the Government and says to its master: "We must have coal to run our trains. You have the coal and we have the money. We want to buy enough coal to run our trains through the State. Fix your own price, any price you have a mind to; we are willing to pay it. We must have coal to run our trains."

The Interstate Commerce Commission has been communicated with, and says this is the only feasible source of supply of coal unless they go to Canada to buy it. We ought not to drive their money from the country. They have the money and are willing to pay for this coal; the Government has the coal, and it ought to be willing to sell a little of it as a public necessity, in order that the road may operate its trains.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, the only point which I raise is, if it is sold to a particular corporation, a corporation designated in the bill, in what way could we get an adequate price for it? Might there not be some trivial amount paid for it and not the full value?

Mr. MYERS. The joint resolution provides that it must not be sold at less than the appraised value. It has been appraised by the Government's own agents and employees. We will certainly put an adequate price upon it. The joint resolution also provides that it shall be sold at a price to be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior, not less than the appraised price. He can go as much higher as he wants to.

This seems to be the only concern that wants or needs it. That, I think, answers the Senator's question.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question there.

Mr. MYERS. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. FALL. Is not the appraised value of this coal, as fixed by the representatives of the department, the value per acre?

Mr. MYERS. I think it is to be appraised at so much per acre.

Mr. FALL. This joint resolution provides for the sale of the coal—not for the sale of the surface land, as I understand it, but for the sale of the coal which has been heretofore reserved to the Government. Is there anything in the joint resolution which would prevent the basis of the sale being so much per ton for the coal, or placed on a basis of so much for the coal delivered outside of the State, for instance? To explain myself more fully, Mr. President, I mean there is a clause in the joint resolution which provides that—

> In the event of a sale, the purchase price thereof shall be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior, and upon payment thereof the said Secretary shall issue to said corporation a contract providing the terms and conditions of said sale.

I admit that I can not understand what this verbiage means.

Mr. MYERS. I take it, Mr. President, that it means that the Secretary of the Interior is to fix the price of the coal underneath the land, and I would judge that he would do it by the acre, but if he thinks that a more advantageous way to the Government can be adopted he might perhaps put it on another basis.

Mr. FALL. If he did put it upon another basis—that is, upon the price of coal delivered at some point outside the boundaries of the State—he would absolutely deprive the State of any right whatsoever to tax the coal output; in other words, it being a Government product, so long as it was not delivered, if the price agreed to be paid for it was the price on delivery——

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. MYERS. With pleasure.

Mr. WALSH. I will say to the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] that an amendment offered by myself has been already adopted by the Senate, which provides, in effect, that nothing in the act contained shall be construed to prevent or deny to the State the right to tax the coal output and to tax the right of the company.

Mr. FALL. Well, Mr. President, nothing in the amendment of the Senator, I think, reaches the point. There is nothing in this joint resolution which would of itself deprive the State of the right to tax, without the amendment of the Senator, just as the resolution stands, unless the coal remained Government property, and if it does remain Government property the State can not tax it. So the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana would not relieve that condition.

Mr. WALSH. Perhaps I did not state the effect of the provision accurately, and I should be very glad to have it read for the information of the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to inquire if the amendment before the Senate is the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA]?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair so understands.

Mr. FALL. I intended to discuss that.

Mr. KENYON. I think the Senator from North Dakota should be present, but I understand he has been sent for.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I am a member of the committee which reported this joint resolution. When it was under consideration in the committee I announced that I had no objection to its being reported, but that I reserved the right to vote against the joint resolution on its passage, and I intend to vote against it. I desire as briefly as possible—I will only, I think, take a very few minutes—to give to the Senate the reasons for my vote.

The situation in this case, as I understand it, is that there is a railroad company which owns about 300 acres of coal land, or something like that acreage, which it has been developing and upon which it has undoubtedly spent considerable money, and the coal from which it has been using for its purposes, acting through a subordinate corporation which, of course, is the corporation of the railroad company. The adjoining lands are either owned by another railroad company or are owned by the Government of the United States. Without the permission as granted in this joint resolution the Republic Coal Co., or whatever name this company is known by which it is seeking to purchase this land, can only legally acquire 460 acres. This joint resolution proposes, in addition to the acreage which they already have, which is something like 300 acres, to allow them to purchase and develop 2,089 acres, I think it is, of coal land.

To pass this joint resolution would be to extend to this particular railroad company a privilege which it has been the policy of this Government so far to deprive every other corporation in the United States of obtaining; in other words, we are asked to pass a special joint resolution here allowing a railroad company—for that is exactly what it means—to acquire, in addition to their present holdings of something like 300 acres of coal land, 2,089 acres of the coal lands of the Government. That is, I say, Mr. President, in absolute conflict with the policy of the Government so far adopted and carried out in legislation, at any rate.

Attempts have been made, of course, from time to time for years by corporations engaged in the coal business to acquire more coal land. One subterfuge after another has been used for that purpose. It has been a recognized fact that the policy of the Government in limiting the acreage to 640 has been in many instances a very mistaken policy. Where a coal acreage is situated along a line of a railroad already constructed, possibly 640 acres of coal land is sufficient; in other words, a company having a market for its coal could put in the necessary tipples and prepare itself to extract and market at reasonable rates of freight over the road the coal from 640 acres at a profit. When, however, the coal lands are situated away from a railroad, and it is necessary to carry the product to the railroad many miles, the cost of hauling is prohibitory, and a company operating 640 acres can not compete with other coal companies whose properties are more favorably located. Therefore we in the West have recognized for many years that there should be some change in the law allowing corporations to acquire more coal lands. For instance, if you undertake to promote the building of a railroad 20 miles or 50 miles or 100 miles long, you can not do it on a basis of 640 acres of coal to be developed. Such an acreage would not afford tonnage enough to pay for the maintenance of the road after its construction and pay interest on its bonds, to say nothing of dividends. For that reason we have advocated generally the increase of the acreage which any one company could acquire. I shall favor general legislation along that line.

I do not agree entirely with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH], who spoke upon this matter on Saturday last. I think that it is going to be the policy of the Government to hold the title to coal or minerals of that character, at any rate, in the Government itself, and to provide for leasing, a royalty system and method of working those coal lands.

I am almost as strongly in favor of State rights as is the Senator from Colorado; but I say I am willing to agree that such a system of leasing would be far preferable to the present system of the absolute reservation of natural resources. So, when a bill is offered such as I think has already been introduced, providing for the disposition of the coal lands and the other mineral lands of this country in larger bodies, under even a leasing system, I am not prepared to say that I will not support it. I am inclined to think that I shall support it; and that the bill, as proposed, allowing the acquisition of a larger acreage to any one corporation should be passed, for the reasons which I have given. Therefore I am not opposed to the proposition of itself to allow this railroad corporation, or any other corporation, to acquire more coal lands than 640 acres. I think that our laws should be amended so that such corporations might be allowed to acquire an additional acreage of coal lands.

However, here is a railroad already constructed, owning coal lands, and desiring to use the coal from other lands for its own purposes. This joint resolution proposes to put this railroad company in a position which is not occupied by any other railroad company in the United States, with the exception of companies which reach the coal areas in Virginia and Pennsylvania and such States. In other words, every other railroad in the western part of this country would still rest under the prohibition contained in our general statutes and could not acquire more than 640 acres of coal land for its own purposes. No railroad in Arizona or in New Mexico or in the Senator's own State of Montana, or in any other part of the West, will have this privilege.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. FALL. I do.

Mr. MYERS. The Northern Pacific Railroad Co. owns each alternate section of land lying along its railroad within 50 miles of each side, which is coal land.

Mr. FALL. I understand that is true, but it is by virtue of a previous grant, with no reservation by the Government of coal lands. The policy of the Government, however, has been changed since the acquisition of those lands by the Northern Pacific Railroad Co. I am in favor, as I have said, of changing the entire policy; and if this were a general bill proposing to allow the railroads to own 2,000 or 2,500 acres of land, I might favor it.

Mr. MYERS. One more question, Mr. President, if the Senator will yield.

Mr. FALL. Certainly.

Mr. MYERS. Where is this Milwaukee road going to get coal with which to operate its trains while the general law is being amended or changed?

Mr. FALL. It is going to get it by going on the open market and competing with the other railroads which have not the advantages which the Senator is seeking to give this railroad. It will have to go into the market and buy its coal as I do and as the Senator does, and as every other railroad does which has not an advocate here who is seeking to confer upon it special privileges.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I wish to say——

Mr. FALL. I do not mean that in any offensive sense to the Senator.

Mr. MYERS. I understand that. My information is that there is no other possible place for this company to buy coal lands in the United States.

Mr. FALL. It can buy coal in Chicago, exactly as every other railroad company does which does not own coal mines whose lines run into Chicago.

Mr. MYERS. Then, Mr. President, it would be utterly crippled as a competing line of the Northern Pacific Railroad.

Mr. FALL. How did the railroad happen to be built?

Mr. MYERS. It was built with the money of men who put it into the road, thinking that they could operate it as a competing line.

Mr. FALL. It certainly was not built upon the basis, as no railroad of this mileage was ever in the history of wildcat promotion in the United States built upon the basis, of 300 acres of coal land.

Mr. MYERS. No, of course not; but it was built on the basis of being a competing line with the Northern Pacific.

Mr. FALL. Certainly.

Mr. MYERS. And the proposition which the Senator makes would put it at a very great disadvantage as a competing line.

Mr. FALL. Why, Mr. President, the Government of the United States has recently been engaged in severing from the Northern Pacific the ownership of other railroads which should be competing lines. One of those railroads, one of the greatest railroad systems in the world, the Southern Pacific, has no coal mines. Then, how can the Southern Pacific compete with the Northern Pacific when it has no coal?

Mr. MYERS. It does not run through the same territory. The two roads of which I speak run through the same competing territory.

Mr. FALL. But the Government has just severed, as I have said, the ownership of the railroads upon the ground that they are competing. I should like to know, if the theory of the Senator is correct, how it is that one owning coal lands and the other one not owning coal lands can be competing lines? The one not owning coal lands could not compete at all.

Mr. President, this is special legislation, conferring special privileges upon one railroad which are denied to every other railroad in the United States. There is no other railroad in the United States that can go into the market to-day and acquire more than 640 acres of coal land from the Government. This joint resolution provides that this railroad can acquire, in addition to what it has already, 2,089 acres, and I can see no reason for extending to this road special privileges which other roads in the United States are denied.

In the second place, the Republic Coal Co., which it is proposed shall acquire an additional tract of 2,089 acres of coal land, is a subsidiary corporation of the railroad company. This joint resolution directly grants to that corporation the right which is denied to other corporations to own coal lands and to use the product of the coal lands for general purposes aside from their own needs. There is nothing in this joint resolution which provides that this corporation, obtaining this 2,089 acres of coal lands, shall not enter into competition with every other coal miner in the United States.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. FALL. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. I likewise offered, and there was adopted by the Senate, an amendment to cover just exactly that case.

Mr. FALL. I am not familiar with the amendment which has been adopted; but if the Senator is no more correct in that statement than he was with reference to his amendment in the other case, then I should like to have it read.

Mr. WALSH. I shall be very glad, Mr. President, to have both of them read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator desire to have the amendment read?

Mr. FALL. Yes; I should like to have it read. The other amendment did not cover the point which I was attempting to make.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read.

The SECRETARY. In the first place, on page 3, in the committee amendment, line 6, after the words "Secretary of the Interior," there have been inserted the words "at a figure not less than the appraised price," so as to read:

In the event of a sale the purchase price thereof shall be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior at a figure not less than the appraised price.

Secondly, there was added at the end of the joint resolution the following:

SEC. 2. Any right or title acquired by the said Republic Coal Co. under the provisions of this act shall terminate and be forfeited—

(a) If the said company, or any of its successors in interest, shall at any time engage in the business of mining or selling coal for the general trade or otherwise than for the use of or to produce power to be used in the operation of railroads, or if it shall sell or dispose of any coal extracted from the said lands or any of them except for such uses.

(b) If the said company, or its successors in interest, shall during any one calendar year after that in which it shall purchase the said lands fail, except by reason of the prevalence of strikes or other conditions for which it is in no way responsible, to extract from the said land less than 200,000 tons of coal.

(c) If the said company, or its successors in interest, shall at any time, except with the written consent of the Secretary of the Interior, sell, assign, or transfer, or contract to sell, assign, or transfer any right acquired by it by virtue of this act; but nothing herein contained shall be deemed to forbid the sale of the coal mined from said lands except as hereinbefore provided.

(d) If the said Republic Coal Co. shall ever become a constituent part of any combination in restraint of trade, or if the said lands of any of them, or the right to mine the coal therein or any part thereof, shall in any manner pass to any such combination, or if any such combination shall be by the said company or any of its successors in interest permitted to mine any coal from said lands.

SEC. 3. Nothing in this act contained shall be deemed to deny to the State of Montana the right to assess for taxation and to levy taxes upon the right and interest in the said lands which may be acquired under the terms of this act, or upon the coal that may be extracted therefrom, but in case of the sale of any interest thus acquired for taxes the grantee from the State shall hold the same subject to the same conditions as are hereby imposed upon the said Republic Coal Co. and under which it will hold the said lands should it acquire the same by virtue of this act.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, may I ask that the Secretary again read the latter part of that amendment as to the grantee of the State being restricted, and so forth?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 3. Nothing in this act contained shall be deemed to deny to the State of Montana the right to assess for taxation and to levy taxes upon the right and interest in the said lands which may be acquired under the terms of this act, or upon the coal that may be extracted therefrom, but in case of the sale of any interest thus acquired for taxes the grantee from the State shall hold the same subject to the same conditions as are hereby imposed upon the said Republic Coal Co. and under which it will hold the said lands should it acquire the same by virtue of this act.

Mr. FALL. In other words, if, under the power of taxation vested in the State, this company should fail to pay its taxes and the land should be bought in by the State, it could never be sold to any one except for railroad or power purposes.

The competition which the Senator has said was prohibited is only competition in the general market. The Republic Coal Co. will be allowed to sell, not only to the railroad company, which it is claimed can not compete with the Northern Pacific without the ownership of the coal itself, but it will be enabled to sell coal to any other railroad company. That is, as I understand, the effect of the amendment. The amendment does not go so far as the Senator undoubtedly thought it did in prohibiting railroad-owned coal being transported in interstate commerce in violation of the law, but does allow the coal company to sell coal to railroad companies aside from the company which is actually buying the land.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, the Senator is undoubtedly correct in his interpretation; and I may say that that was exactly my purpose.

Mr. FALL. I supposed so. Mr. President, there seems to be a peculiar condition in the State of Montana. The Senator says that his very purpose is to allow the acquisition of a large acreage of coal land—nearly four times as much, including that already owned by the company, as any other one company in the United States is allowed to acquire from the public domain—so that other railroads in Montana than that which is now a competitor of the Northern Pacific may be allowed to acquire coal from the Republic Coal Co. That is the avowed purpose. Now, Mr. President, how can that be defended except upon the general theory that the laws do not provide for the acquisition of a sufficient amount of coal lands to enable a railroad company always to compete with another which happens, fortunately, to have coal lands, without going into the market and competing with the other railroads which are not fortunate enough to have coal land? How it can be defended, I admit I do not see.

As to general legislation, as I have said, I am perfectly willing to agree that all corporations, including railroad companies, shall have a right to acquire more than 640 acres of coal lands. One of the Senators from Montana insists that it is necessary to enable the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad to compete with the Northern Pacific that it should be allowed to acquire three or four times the amount of coal lands on the public domain which any other railroad can acquire. The other Senator from Montana says that his amendment is to provide that the coal extracted from these lands may be sold to other railroad companies in Montana for the purpose of enabling them, apparently, to compete with the Northern Pacific. Mr. President, I object to special legislation of this character, whether needed or not. Difficulties of this kind should be cured by general legislation, and there should not be special exceptions made.

As I have said, the Southern Pacific Railroad Co., with its 8,000 miles of track, one of the greatest railroad systems in the United States, has no coal lands. It has been compelled to adopt oil burners and to acquire oil lands in the last few years to enable it to compete with other transcontinental railroads. With its 8,000 miles it can not acquire more than 640 acres of coal lands. The Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railroad, also penetrating and traversing the West, can only acquire 640 acres of coal lands. No other railroad in the entire western country or in the United States can acquire more than 640 acres of coal lands from the public domain. They must go into the open market and compete with other railroads, and compete with the users of coal in other lines of business; but this railroad is to have a special exception made in its favor. I can not give my consent, Mr. President, to support legislation of this character.

Another objection which I have, the Senator has undoubtedly endeavored to meet by his amendment, but I do not think he has done so, and that is that legislation of this character, if enacted without amendment, would deprive the State, the local municipal government, of any power of taxation, of any revenue to be derived from the lands themselves or from the output of coal. The Senator has attempted, undoubtedly in good faith, to meet that objection, but the question which I asked was this: How will the coal be sold, it being left to the Secretary of the Interior to make the contract? If the coal is sold on a basis of tonnage to be delivered beyond the boundaries of the State, as is often the case, it can not be subjected to local taxation. The amendment offered by the Senator would not meet that proposition.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, the amendment is intended to meet just exactly that condition as well, because it provides that not only shall the output be subject to taxation, but that the interest which the Republic Coal Co. acquires in the land by virtue of the act shall be subject to taxation.

Mr. FALL. But, Mr. President, this is not an attempt to sell land. This bill provides for the sale of the coal in the land.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I apprehend that the Senator will agree that the right which this company acquires under and by virtue of this act will be property that will have a value.

Mr. FALL. I do not know——

Mr. WALSH. That right, whatever it is, is made subject to taxation.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, the right or license to enter upon a mining property and to extract therefrom ores is not such a right as may be taxed. If, as I have said, coal is sold to be paid for when delivered at certain points, there at those points it would become taxable, being the property of the purchaser. If there is a right given to me to go into a mine and extract ores therefrom and to pay for such ores when delivered at a certain point, my interest attaches in the delivery at that point; and I might have a preferential right or an intangible interest, but not one subject to taxation.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. FALL. I do.

Mr. WALSH. My understanding is that there is a vast number of such rights outstanding, for instance in the State of West Virginia, under which the contractee or lessee or grantee, or whatever he may be called, has the right to enter upon lands owned by other parties and extract the coal therefrom. The right thus acquired, according to my understanding, is in many cases one of immense value. Is it the idea of the Senator from New Mexico that that right is not a right subject to taxation?

Mr. FALL. It is a right subject to taxation if the title attaches to the coal when extracted. The Senator is a mining lawyer, and he knows that the title to ores under a license of this character does not attach until the ore is actually severed from the real estate. As a mining lawyer, he knows it. If that right attaches where the State of West Virginia can enforce its right of taxation, yes; but if it does not, if the right to the ore separated from the real estate does not accrue until the ore itself is delivered beyond the boundaries of the State, no; it can not.

Mr. President, I do not wish to be hypercritical; but wherever there is an effort by the Federal Government to go into a State and to maintain in perpetuity its right to properties within the boundaries of that State, to deal with them as it pleases, to hand them over to people not citizens of the State or to citizens of the State, retaining the title to the property in the Government, I am going to endeavor at least to see that the State and the local government secure some portion of the revenue to be derived by the Federal Government from such ownership. Otherwise you will leave the State of New Mexico—not so fortunate, possibly, as the State represented by the Senator who is insistent upon this theory—you will leave the State of New Mexico in a condition where its pioneers can go no further in its development, and where we can not support a State government.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. FALL. I yield.

Mr. GRONNA. I simply wanted to suggest to the Senator from New Mexico that this is not all public land.

Mr. FALL. I understand it is not.

Mr. GRONNA. Some of it has been already patented.

Mr. FALL. Yes; but it is land in which the Government has reserved the minerals.

Mr. GRONNA. Yes.

Mr. FALL. It did not do that in the Union Pacific grants; but in the case of these particular lands, as I understand, the Government did reserve the minerals. Now an attempt is made—and this is the opening wedge—to go into those lands the mineral of which is reserved and to deprive the State or the local government of any revenue to be obtained from them. I mean that is what is attempted by the general legislation. I am not referring now to the amendment, which, of course, I understand the Senator from North Dakota offers in good faith. The amendment, as intended by the Senator, undoubtedly would allow some of the revenue to go to the State; that is, it would allow its general tax laws to remain in force, as they do not apply as against any property of the United States. As the Senator knows, whenever this property becomes the property of an individual, by a sale and delivery from the United States, it is subject to taxation; but so long as it remains the property of the United States Government it is not subject to taxation.

Mr. President, I know that my views do not coincide with those of at least one of the Senators from Montana. We have conflicted in our views of policy as well as in our views of what the law is; not only what it should be but what it is. I presume we are of such entirely different lines of thought that that conflict probably will be irreconcilable, much to my regret. I am willing to go with him to the extent of saying that the United States Government, contrary to our entire theory governing practically up to the last two or three years, may retain to itself the ownership of the minerals in the ground; but I will never go so far as to consent that those minerals shall be disposed of, unless there is some provision made that at least a portion of the revenue derived shall go to the local government. Otherwise our States have not come into the Union upon an equality with the other States.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. FALL. I do.

Mr. GRONNA. The amendment I offered on Saturday provides that 50 per cent of the amount received from this land shall go to the State.

Mr. FALL. I appreciate that, and I am heartily in favor of the Senator's amendment. I am against this special legislation; but if the Senate is going to adopt such legislation as this, for which there is no authority or precedent, the Senator's amendment certainly should be adopted.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I am a member of the committee that reported this bill. I opposed the bill in the committee and I am opposed to it here, regardless of the amendments. I think some of the amendments have improved it; others may improve it still more; but the principle involved, it seems to me, is wrong.

The Republic Coal Co. is a corporation owned by the Milwaukee Railroad Co. Under the laws it has taken up as much coal as it can take up, and has about exhausted it, as I understand.

Mr. MYERS. I desire to say to the Senator that neither the Republic Coal Co. nor the Milwaukee Railroad Co. has taken up any coal lands that belong to the United States. The Republic Coal Co. now owns one section of coal land in Montana, but it bought it from the State of Montana. It did not acquire it from the United States at all.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; but the Republic Coal Co., as I understand—and I should like to be corrected by the Senator if I am wrong—is not qualified under the law to take the coal that this bill seeks to sell to it. Am I correct?

Mr. MYERS. Oh, yes; I admit that, or else the bill would not be here.

Mr. NORRIS. The Republic Coal Co., as I understand, was organized by this railroad company as a subsidiary corporation to supply the railroad company with coal. The railroad company owns all of the stock of the coal company. So, to get down to a practical proposition, this is a bill providing that the United States Government shall lease or sell—whichever way you have a mind to put it, or whichever condition the bill may be in when it is finally amended—to the Milwaukee Railroad Co. about 2,000 acres of coal land in the State of Montana.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, the exact quantity, of course, is not material in a consideration of the principle involved.

Mr. NORRIS. No; I said "about 2,000 acres."

Mr. MYERS. I figure that it is about 1,580 acres of land.

Mr. NORRIS. The way I figured it some time ago—I think when we had the bill before the committee—it was something over 1,900 acres; but that is not material. I am not opposed to the bill because it is more than 1,500 acres or because it is less than some other amount. I am opposed to it because, in my judgment, it is not the proper thing for Congress to dispose of the public lands of the United States in this way. I am opposed to providing by a special act for the sale of a specific piece of property to a specific corporation. We ought to provide for opening up our coal mines by general legislation, and it is the principle involved that brings about my opposition.

There are some equities in this case. It was said, for instance—and I have no doubt but that it is true; it so appeared to me, at least, before the committee—that this particular railroad company was in direct competition with the Northern Pacific Railroad Co. and that the Northern Pacific Railroad Co. owned its own coal mines, that were located in public lands that had been granted to it by the Government at the time it built its road. Mr. President, if that is a sufficient reason, we ought to provide by law for selling this much coal land to every other railroad company that does not now own coal lands.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. MYERS. I should like to make just one statement at that juncture, please. That suggestion was made by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] during his speech. I wish to say that there is no other railroad company in the United States which operates a railroad entirely across the country within 50 miles of the line of the Northern Pacific. The Milwaukee road is the only railroad in the United States that does that.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Southern Pacific own coal mines?

Mr. MYERS. I say this is the only railroad company which operates a line of railroad across the continent within 50 miles of the track of the Northern Pacific Railroad Co.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator does not mean to say that all these other large railroad companies have been given or sold coal lands by the United States Government, does he?

Mr. MYERS. Oh, no; not at all; but this is the only line that competes within 50 miles across the country of the track of the Northern Pacific Railroad Co.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to ask the Senator a question for information. I am not informed about the matter. Has the Great Northern Railroad Co. been granted coal lands by the Government?

Mr. MYERS. No. It is not within 50 miles of the Northern Pacific.

Mr. NORRIS. I did not say it was; but it is a direct competitor of both of these companies, and in some places all three of these roads come into the same cities.

Mr. MYERS. But practically all of the track of the Great Northern is much more than 50 miles from the Northern Pacific.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. MYERS. More than that, I wish to suggest at this juncture that the Great Northern does own extensive coal mines.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; but it bought them.

Mr. MYERS. I suppose it did. So is this company willing to buy them.

Mr. NORRIS. It did not buy them from the Government. There was not any special act of Congress passed selling the coal lands to the Great Northern Railroad, was there?

Mr. MYERS. No; and if this company could buy from private individuals it would not be here applying to the Government.

Mr. NORRIS. There are hundreds and hundreds of railroads that have to buy their coal. This road will have to buy its coal the same as any other road.

Mr. MYERS. I will say, if I may be permitted just a minute, that after a thorough investigation I do not know of any other coal lands that could be bought by the Milwaukee road. I am informed that the question was referred to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and it has reported that the only other possible source was for it to get its coal in Canada.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. NORRIS. In just a moment. In my judgment, that is no reason why we should pass this joint resolution. If that be true, the same thing applies to hundreds of other railroads. If it applies to railroad companies, why should it not apply to manufacturing institutions? Why should it not apply to individuals? Why should we not pass a law here providing for the sale of a specifically described tract of land to a specific individual, because we could say that in years past his competitor in business had been given some special privilege by a State or a county or a nation?

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I do not want to be contentious, nor to interrupt the Senator too much.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no objection to the Senator's interrupting.

Mr. MYERS. I simply wanted to give emphasis to this point, which has had some weight, with my judgment, at least, in this matter, whether it may commend itself to anybody else or not: This is the only railroad company which is operating a line of road entirely across the country in direct competition with, and within 50 miles of the track of, the Northern Pacific Railroad, which was granted each alternate section within 50 miles of its line, whether it contained coal or not. It was given to the Northern Pacific Railroad. This road, on the contrary, is not seeking to have anything given to it, but will pay the full, ample, complete price and value of the coal. Furthermore, I know of no other place where it can buy coal lands from private individuals. If it could it would a great deal rather do it than to come here asking Congress to have the Government sell it.

Mr. NORRIS. It ought to buy its coal like any other railroad does that does not own it—in the open market—like I have to buy my coal; like every business man has to buy his coal. The fact that it happens to be within 50 miles of some particular road is not saying that other roads that are more than 50 miles away at that point are not in just as complete competition with the Northern Pacific road as that road is. There are places on the Northern Pacific line where they come in competition with the Burlington road, where they come in competition with the Great Northern road, where they come in competition with the Union Pacific road, where they come in competition with the Central Pacific road, and the North Western road, and a great many other roads that do not occur to me now, with which I am not familiar; but there is not any reason, at least in my judgment, why we should select this one road and say: "We will pass a special act here granting to you a specific piece of property."

It does not seem to me that it is proper legislation. Just so long as we continue to do that sort of thing we shall put off so much further and so much longer the day when we shall pass the right kind of a coal-mining law that will enable everybody, individuals and corporations alike, to take enough coal for their operations.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska further yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. NORRIS. I had promised to yield to the Senator from Iowa. I will yield to him now, and then to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. KENYON. I was just curious to know what the 50 miles the Senator from Montana speaks of has to do with the discussion. Is it not true that the Great Northern is closer to the Northern Pacific nearly all the way across the country than the Milwaukee is?

Mr. MYERS. No; that is not correct. It is much farther away.

Mr. KENYON. But is it not true that at many places it is much nearer to that road than the Milwaukee?

Mr. NORRIS. It runs into the same depots in a great many places.

Mr. MYERS. They run into Spokane together; but as soon as they get out of Spokane on either side, east or west, they rapidly diverge.

Mr. NORRIS. They come into St. Paul together.

Mr. MYERS. Yes; they come into St. Paul together, of course.

Mr. NORRIS. They are competitors. There is not any doubt about that.

Mr. KENYON. They are, theoretically, competing lines.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes. Now I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. MYERS. The Great Northern owns vast bodies of coal lands——

Mr. NORRIS. I know it does.

Mr. MYERS. Which it was fortunately able to purchase from individuals; and if this road could do the same thing, it would not be here, I am satisfied.

I wish, however, to make this kindly suggestion to the Senator. He refers so much to special legislation, and other Senators do. I know that that seems to be the great point of objection with many. I wish to ask the Senator, in all kindliness, if this is any more special legislation or more objectionable as special legislation, considering the public benefits to flow from it, than it was to give the city of San Francisco the right to erect a dam on public land in the Yosemite Park? Why not have said in that case, "Let us pass a general law providing that any city desiring to improve its water system can have the right, upon certain terms, to occupy public lands in parks"?

Different conditions make circumstances different in each case; and what may be right and equitable in one case may not be right in all.

Mr. NORRIS. I will answer the Senator. In my judgment this joint resolution is in no sense to be compared with the Hetch Hetchy bill, to which he refers. As far as I am concerned, if the resolution proposed to give this coal to a city, to a municipality, and if it were properly guarded so that they could use it only for municipal purposes, I should vote to give it to them outright, without charging them a penny for it. That would go to the public. When we granted to San Francisco the right to build a dam in the mountains to get pure water for her citizens we were doing something for the public, for the people.

This resolution, on the other hand, if we pass it, is not going to make freight rates any cheaper. This resolution is not for the benefit of the public. While I would not want to do anything against the railroad companies that I would not do against an individual, I am not in favor of doing anything for a railroad company that I would not do for an individual. They are going to use this coal, if they get it, to make money out of it. I do not blame them for that. It is proper that they should; but that does away with the proposition that this resolution is on all fours with legislation where we give something to a municipality, where there are millions of people involved, and where the public get direct benefit from the legislation.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, just on that point, it seems to me that the benefits derived by the public from a transcontinental railroad system are just as great to those served as the benefits to be derived from a water supply.

Mr. NORRIS. Why, certainly. Nobody is saying anything against the transcontinental railroads. They have their place. We are glad they are there. So far as I am concerned I do not desire, and I do not believe any man who is opposed to this joint resolution desires, to legislate in any way that would be harmful to any of them. That, however, is no reason why we should give to this company, by a special act, a privilege that we can not and will not give to hundreds of other railroad companies, many of which are in direct competition with this one.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. KENYON. Some question arose as to the amount of land involved in this joint resolution.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. KENYON. I call the attention of the Senator from Nebraska to the letter from the Secretary of the Interior, found on pages 2 and 3 of the committee's report, in which he states that the total area is 2,089.5 acres.

Mr. NORRIS. I presume that is correct.

Mr. KENYON. The quantity is not important in a consideration of the principle, but I thought it might be well to give the exact facts.

Mr. NORRIS. No; it is not important, of course. I remember figuring it once myself, and I thought it was 1,900 acres. I have no doubt, however, but that the figures given by the Senator from Iowa are correct, because the Secretary's report on the matter would be accurate.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question, with the assurance that I am only asking a question? I am not going to move to take him off his feet or to lay this measure aside in any way.

Mr. NORRIS. I will say to the Senator that I have no objection to his taking me off my feet nor to laying this measure aside.

Mr. McCUMBER. Experience makes it necessary, you know, to make this statement.

The Senator knows that the Government has reserved the coal in these lands. I understand the surface of the lands is in private ownership.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not sure whether that is true as to all of them or not. It is as to part of them, at least.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes. Assuming that to be true—I do not know, however, that that would make much difference—we have reserved the coal. Now, we find some one that wants to use the coal. What would the Senator do with it? Would he say, "I refuse to give it to you," or would the Senator say, "I will lease it to you," or "I will sell the coal to you"?

It seems as though we ought to adopt some kind of a policy as to when we may dispose of that which we have reserved. I am asking the question in order to get the Senator's view upon the question.

Mr. NORRIS. I will answer the Senator. I think his question is a perfectly proper one.

Personally I am in favor of passing some legislation at this session of Congress providing in a general way for the taking up of coal lands in the United States. I understand such a bill is soon to be reported. We have a law now on the subject, but I believe it is generally conceded that it is not a good law, and that the amount that can be taken is so small that it is not a practical proposition for people to take up. In my judgment, however, there is no reason why we should commence to pass special acts when by exercising the same power and the same authority we can by general act provide for the taking of these lands.

Let us see where we would get to if we should follow that theory. There are thousands and thousands of other tracts of coal land in the United States. We pass a special act for this railroad company. We pass another special act for every other railroad company. We pass another special act for every corporation that wants to go into the coal business, all through Colorado, through Montana, and through all the States that have coal lands. If this is to be the method of disposing of coal lands, we shall have 40,000 bills here for our consideration, and we shall not have time to do anything else if we work 24 hours a day but pass special acts making specific sales of specific property to specific persons.

It strikes me that is not practical, and that is the main reason why I am opposed to this bill. Just as long as we continue to pass special acts we will put off the day when we will get a general law that will be workable and that will apply to the entire United States and to all her citizens.

Mr. MYERS. Just a word in that connection.

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. MYERS. I believe one-half of the acts Congress passes are special acts—special pension acts, acts to put up public buildings in cities, acts to enable cities to acquire sites for water supplies, acts to issue patents to private individuals, and so forth. I believe one-half of the acts we pass are special legislation.

Mr. NORRIS. Perhaps more than half; but that is not any excuse for passing this measure. The fact that we are passing a lot of special acts now, a great many of which are absolutely necessary and a great many of which are unnecessary, perhaps—the fact that we are passing special acts in regard to pensioning some individuals who under the general law are not able to get proper relief—is no reason why we should on that account, and because we have done that, enter upon the field of passing special acts for the disposition of coal lands in the United States. That means, as every Senator will see in a moment if he will give it thought, that we would have more business of that kind than we would be physically able to perform. We would not be able to do it right, anyway, because everybody knows that Congress is not able to dispose of its various tracts of land all over the country by special acts and come anywhere near doing either justice or equity.

We ought to have a general law dealing with this subject; and if the present law is faulty, or wherever it is faulty, we ought to have it remedied so that all corporations and all individuals may be treated exactly the same.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I am not going to detain the Senate with any particular discussion of the merits of the joint resolution. I rose simply to say something by reason of the discussion of the distinguished Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] when this measure was before the Senate some days since.

If I understood his argument aright, it was to the effect that the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] ought not to prevail, because the Congress of the United States has no power to lease the public lands; that such a disposition—if the word may be used—of the public lands is an infringement upon the rights of the States and a violation of the compact under which the title to these lands was originally vested in the Government; likewise, that it is a reversal of a policy which has obtained from the beginning of the Government, a policy of absolute alienation of the public lands as distinguished from the retention of title under a leasing system.

I should say nothing about that here if it were not for the fact that we shall be obliged to meet that question in the consideration not only of the Alaska coal-land bill but of the general bill for the disposition of coal lands, lands containing oil and gas, deposits of phosphates, deposits of sodium, deposits of potassium, and all of these valuable deposits on the public lands of the West.

Mr. President, I desire to announce now that I have myself been for many years an ardent opponent of the propaganda in favor of the retention of title to these lands by the Government of the United States and the substitution of a leasing system. But, Mr. President, we have come to a time when we must either determine to yield something to those who honestly believe that that is the proper policy to be pursued or we must content ourselves with the perpetuation of the present paralysis that affects the mining industry of the West, for we all know that the laws now existing for the alienation of the fee of these lands have not been enforced by the Government, and in the face of the public sentiment which exists I undertake to say that they will not be enforced. So far as I am concerned—and I believe I speak the sentiment of the people of my State and I believe the sentiment of the people of the States of the West generally—I am willing to accede to some kind of a leasing law in relation to these valuable deposits, not because we want it, not because we think it is the best system, but because we recognize that we have got to have it or have no effective law for the disposition of lands at all. At least that is my own individual view of the matter.

Mr. President, I simply desire to say a word in reference to the power of Congress to legislate concerning the leasing of the public lands. A very erroneous opinion exists with respect to that matter. It has not been the uniform policy of the Government to alienate its lands containing mineral deposits. The truth is that up to the year 1829 the policy of reserving lands containing valuable minerals from general disposition and retaining title in the Government was a fixed policy. The fact is, that early in the history of our Government an act was passed for the leasing of lands containing lead ores, and that act was enforced for many years. The mines of the States of Illinois, Wisconsin, and Missouri were operated under that leasing law. The people of the State of Missouri protested very loudly and very earnestly, however, against that act and against the administration of it. So in the year 1829 it was provided that the law should no longer have any application to mineral deposits in the State of Missouri; but it continued in force until it was eventually repealed in the year 1846, when the policy was first inaugurated of disposing of the mineral lands in fee.

Mr. President, I ought to say in this connection that the policy was abandoned after a fair trial as one not suited to the people of this country, and the failure of it in its operation I shall speak of at length on some other occasion. I shall not undertake to detain the Senate now. The system has been tried out here and has been found a failure.

Of course, I am perfectly free to admit that the conditions have entirely changed, and that we enter upon the old policy, if we shall enter upon it, of leasing the mineral deposits in the public lands under conditions that are essentially different from those that obtained when the system was in force before. Whether that will eventuate in different results, I am not prepared to say.

But, Mr. President, this very argument that we listen to, made so earnestly here by the distinguished Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] the other day, to the effect that it is beyond the power of Congress to lease, was presented to the Supreme Court of the United States and the decision was against it. It has been solemnly adjudicated by that court that the grant in the Constitution of the United States to Congress to "make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory and other property belonging to the United States" grants to the Congress the right to lease its public lands, to sell its public lands, to give away its public lands for public purposes, and to make any other disposition of them which it sees fit.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I think the Senator misunderstood me if he understood that I said Congress did not have the power. I claimed that the policy of disposing of the public lands had been a fixed policy when Colorado was admitted into the Union in 1876, and that it would be wrong and place us at an unfair advantage if the Government did not give us the same privileges that had been given to Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, and Kansas.

Mr. WALSH. It is simply a question of policy, and that is all there is to it. There is no question of power at all. The power is put past controversy by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States. I will read from the first volume of Lindley on Mines, section 80, as follows:

> While in the various treaties of cession and purchase through which territory was acquired and added to the national domain the Federal Government recognized and obligated itself to protect the rights and equities of grantees of the ceding nation or State, and by virtue of its federated system of government held certain property in trust for future States—> the great mass of the acquired territory falls within the designation of "public lands," and passed to the United States untrammeled by either the tradition, laws, or policy of the ceding power or by compact with the new States.

Here is a note saying that refers to tide lands and other lands under navigable waters—

Citing the case of United States v. Gratiot (1 McLean, 454; also 14 Peters, 526):

> As such absolute owner the Government might at its pleasure withhold its lands from occupation or purchase, lease them for limited periods, donate them to States for educational or other purposes, and to individuals or corporations to aid in the construction of railways and other internal improvements, sell or otherwise dispose of them absolutely or conditionally, and prescribe the terms and conditions under which private individuals might acquire permanent ownership or the right of temporary enjoyment.

The very question there presented had been determined by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Gratiot, to which I have referred.

So we may consider this question solely upon a basis of policy; and so far as I am concerned it is a question whether we shall leave the lands idle or have them operated. In that condition of affairs I am willing to meet the other gentlemen in an effort to frame some kind of a law under which these deposits will be open to exploration and to working. So I do not think that is any reason for my refusal to vote for the amendment suggested by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA].

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I desire to say only a few words with reference to the joint resolution. The Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS], who has charge of the joint resolution, has sought to compare the position of the Republic Coal Co., a subsidiary corporation to the Milwaukee road, with the Northern Pacific Railroad. To carry out his analogy, if we are to put those two railroads upon an equal footing, the Government would have to do an impossible thing. It would have to make a grant of millions of acres of land to this railroad without reservation, granting to it not only timber but the coal that is in the land.

We have arrived at an entirely new condition of affairs in this country so far as the public lands are concerned. That we must continue to carry out the policy which the country adopted when we had a continental domain extending from the Mississippi River to the Pacific Ocean without settlement in order to encourage the building of railroads into an unsettled country, and that it must be applied to a railroad which is extended through a country of vast business—more business than the railroads which are there can possibly take care of—seems to me to be a very far-fetched analogy.

The price at which this land is proposed to be sold to the Milwaukee road is a mere pittance in comparison with its value. The Senator from North Dakota has made some figures as to the value of the coal that is in this land.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, just a word, if the Senator pleases.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will yield in just a moment. The Senator from North Dakota submitted figures based upon the amount that the Geological Survey has estimated. If a rate of 5 cents per ton royalty were fixed as a payment upon a leasing system, it would amount to $500,000, in comparison with $84,000 which the Government would derive under the joint resolution of which the Senator from Montana has charge. I see no reason why such a largess should be bestowed by special act upon this railroad company. It occupies the same position with reference to coal and transportation problems that many other railroads do.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. MYERS. The joint resolution does not fix any price. It says that it shall not be sold at less than the appraised value, and the Secretary of the Interior can avail himself of all available information to fix any price he wants. He can use the very figures, and probably will, that the Director of the Geological Survey furnishes in estimating what the corporation ought to pay for this coal.

Mr. KENYON. The original measure did not have any provision as to the appraised value—at least, not as it was presented from the committee. Possibly among the amendments of the Senator from Montana there may be such a provision. Is that correct?

Mr. MYERS. My colleague [Mr. WALSH] offered an amendment which provided that it should not be less than the appraised value. I was under the impression that that amendment had been put in by the committee, but my colleague discovered it had not, and offered an amendment to that effect. I am heartily in favor of the amendment. I think it is a wise thing, and I am glad my colleague offered it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The average price of this land, between the limits of the appraised value, is $41 an acre, and it is upon that basis that I made the estimate which I stated a moment ago. The joint resolution provides that it shall not be sold at less than the appraised value.

Mr. KERN. Will the Senator from Washington yield to me for a motion to go into executive session?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Indiana for that purpose.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. KERN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 17 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 32 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, March 24, 1914, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, increase, we beseech Thee, our faith, hope, love, since these qualities of soul bind us to Thee and to our fellow men. With them is religion; without them atheism. With them harmony; without them discord. With them progress; without them reversion to type. With them law and order; without them anarchy. "Therefore, my beloved brethren, be ye steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, for as much as ye know that your labor is not in vain in the Lord."

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, March 21, 1914, was read and approved.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the river and harbor bill.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, pending that motion I desire to submit a request for unanimous consent——

The SPEAKER. For what?

Mr. LANGLEY. To extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a speech——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman what the speech is?

Mr. LANGLEY. The speech is one delivered the other evening by ex-Senator Foraker on Panama Canal tolls.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri objects. The gentleman from Florida moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the river and harbor appropriation bill.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of H. R. 13811, the river and harbor appropriation bill, with Mr. ALEXANDER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13811) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 14, line 12——

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, we were discussing the preceding paragraph, on page 14, when we adjourned the other night. I desire to make an amendment by moving to strike out the last word.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I think there is a motion, made by the gentleman from Texas, to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. FREAR. Yes; that is right.

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman from Texas is not present at this particular time. I ask unanimous consent that that item be passed without prejudice.

Mr. FREAR. That will be advisable.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I shall have to object to that.

Mr. FOSTER. Then the gentleman will have to keep a quorum here this afternoon.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I have no objection to an amendment being offered, but——

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Wisconsin desires to be heard a little longer than five minutes on this proposition. It is very important, the purchase of the Delaware Canal, and I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Wisconsin may proceed for 15 minutes.

Mr. FREAR. With the right to object, I ask that the chairman of the committee let this matter be passed over as suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER], for the reason that this provides for an expenditure of $20,000,000, and it does not seem to me we ought to force the committee to act until Mr. CALLAWAY has an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MADDEN. I object. I do not think the time ought to be extended to 15 minutes to accommodate anybody.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. CALLAWAY, of Texas, had the floor when the point of order was made on the last legislative day; what has become of Mr. CALLAWAY?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not know where he is.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is made that there is no quorum present; the Chair will count.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is withdrawn.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Wisconsin may proceed for 15 minutes on this item.

Mr. MADDEN. I am going to object to anybody proceeding for 15 minutes on any item in this bill.

Mr. MANN. Well, I make the request for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Wisconsin may proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I esteem it a great privilege that the committee has given me 10 minutes upon this item of $20,000,000 in this bill, and I trust the House will advise itself of the character of this item before it votes upon this canal. On page 86 of the intercoastal waterway report it is stated by the engineer:

> In all earlier investigations the principal object in view with reference to this proposition was to provide the city of Baltimore a direct and safe outlet to the ocean. Naturally the pressure for the desired outlet has originated largely in Baltimore, and a satisfactory solution of the problem presented demanded that the outlet be made as direct as possible.

This, then, is a proposition from the city of Baltimore, and it expects to some day ask the Government to appropriate $20,000,000. Indirectly, on the face of the bill, it is a proposition for only $1,300,000; but $20,000,000 is the amount that is contemplated in the future, and the amount that will eventually be passed by this House if Baltimore's claims are recognized.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Not at this time. Later on, if I can get a little more time, I will be glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MOORE. I think the gentleman has the wrong report.

Mr. FREAR. No; I have not. Says the report, as a reason for this $20,000,000 proposition:

> During the last five years many vessels and lives have been lost along the coast between Cape Charles and Cape Henlopen, between which points there is no harbor of refuge except the inadequate one at Chincoteague. Among the vessels so lost were 32 engaged in the coastwise trade which might have used the canal, if the same had been available and free, and which would in that way have avoided the dangers which caused their loss. The value of these vessels and their cargoes is not known, but the aggregate tonnage was about 22,600, and it may be assumed that there was lost with them not less than 12,000 tons of freight. Vessels of this class generally carry all that can be loaded upon them, and the above assumption is conservative.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this bill does not now propose to appropriate $20,000,000. It proposes to appropriate, however, over $6,000,000, and together with the $450,000 which has been paid in this case it amounts to over $7,200,000. That is the proposition before us. But the one to which our attention is directed is the $20,000,000 appropriation that is contemplated in the future to make a deeper channel. That is for 25 feet.

Mr. SPARKMAN. The gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. FREAR. Will you give me extra time?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I trust the gentleman would like to be corrected.

Mr. FREAR. I would. But you propose eventually a 25-foot channel.

Mr. SPARKMAN. There is no proposition of that kind before the House.

Mr. FREAR. Not at this particular time, but in the future, according to the engineers' estimates for a deeper channel. This is for only $7,200,000 at the present time, but the other will follow. I have estimated, Mr. Chairman, that in 100 years, at the rate of loss which has occurred, according to the Engineers' report, of 12,000 tons in 5 years, it will amount to 60,000 tons, and considering only a $6,000,000 appropriation to be the limit, it will cost $100 to save every ton lost at sea during that period, which the Government will pay. However, the appropriations will be never ending. If it be the policy of the Government to give protection at an expense of $100 a ton for all loss, then this is a good proposition, but the project ought to be based upon something more substantial than such a statement.

On page 99 we read:

The foreign trade carried in vessels not too deep to pass through the canal is estimated as follows: Steamers, 480 annually; tonnage, 1,589,938. The saving in time is therefore 320 days, and the cost of operating may be placed at not less than $150 per day, or the annual saving may be stated as $48,000. This does not include the saving in time for sailing vessels and barges.

At $150 per day—I am reading from page 99—the annual saving may be estimated at $48,000. This does not include the saving of time——

Mr. GOULDEN. Will the gentleman give me the date of that?

Mr. FREAR. These are statistics of what has gone through the canal.

Mr. GOULDEN. What is the date of the engineers' report from which you are reading?

Mr. FREAR. It is 1912—Sixty-second Congress.

Mr. GOULDEN. I heard some one state that it was not the latest, and I am desirous of having that which is up to date.

Mr. FREAR. If they will only give me time I will take care of the proposition. This is what is before Congress now, although it is not proposed in this appropriation. Here is an appropriation of $7,200,000. Is that denied by the committee?

Mr. MADDEN. Where is it?

Mr. FREAR. I can not tell you, excepting that it appears in this engineers' report.

Mr. MADDEN. We are dealing with the bill.

Mr. FREAR. No; we are not. We are dealing with the future in this case. I refuse to be further interrupted at this time.

This is a 13-mile canal. We propose to put in $8,000,000 in the purchase of the canal after deducting that $1,300,000, which makes the canal cost at those figures here over $550,000 a mile.

Mr. MURDOCK. Do they deny that?

Mr. FREAR. They can not deny it.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman say from what report he is reading? That is what I want to find out.

Mr. FREAR. Will the gentleman answer me what is proposed to be expended on this canal as it stands now?

Mr. MOORE. It is estimated by the engineers that the canal will cost over $8,000,000.

Mr. FREAR. That is all I have to say; that is the estimate per mile, based on $8,000,000.

Mr. MOORE. From what report are you reading?

Mr. FREAR. The engineers' report.

Mr. MOORE. Which one? There are three or four reports.

Mr. FREAR. I can not yield. The report is dated 1912. It is for $8,000,000. That is over $600,000 a mile for 13 miles, and it will be over $1,000,000 a mile when you get the depth for the deep-water vessels by spending $20,000,000.

Now, the thing that interests me, Mr. Chairman, is the abandon with which these engineers enter into their recommendations to purchase this canal for $2,000,000. That is their proposition. What do they know about the advisability of purchasing this canal more than Members of the House?

It was argued Saturday by one of the gentlemen who was discussing this question that we ought to have this canal for the purpose of carrying troops from Philadelphia to Baltimore. Think of the absurdity of that proposition. It would take a whole day by boat, when inside of two hours you could land them by rail.

Mr. Chairman, we have two or three propositions in connection with this that are interesting. We have had experience in canals. We built a $7,000,000 canal in Illinois a short time ago, and I will ask anybody who expected to be benefited by the canal where one dollar was saved to the people of Iowa or elsewhere by reason of that project, in freight rates or otherwise. The Hennepin Canal is not used. It has been practically abandoned, except by pleasure boats, according to the statistics.

We have the Erie Canal for our guidance. That canal in 1880 shipped 4,108,581 tons of freight. At that time—in 1880—the Erie Canal shipped 18 per cent of the total freight that was shipped by boat and rail from New York to Buffalo. In 1906, after 16 years, the freight tonnage on the Erie Canal had dropped to 2,383,481 tons. The canal was then shipping only 3 per cent of the freight, according to statistics. In 1912, only two years ago, the total freight shipped on the Erie Canal was 1,798,069 tons, or 2 per cent of the total water and rail freight shipped between New York and Buffalo. And $130,000,000 is proposed now, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOULDEN] said the other day, to improve that canal so as to make reduced freight charges.

Mr. GOULDEN. That is right; bring it up to date. It is $130,000,000, and is considered a good investment by the people of my State.

Mr. FREAR. I have not any further data than 1912.

Mr. GOULDEN. To bring the great Erie Canal up to date, accommodating barges of 3,000 tons instead of 250 tons, and to change the motive power from mules to oil or gasoline-propelled motors making an average of 10 miles per hour.

Mr. FREAR. I understand. Now, Mr. Chairman, we have had some experience in canals. We are proposing to spend $8,000,000 for this Chesapeake and Delaware Canal. We had the Hennepin Canal, and after spending $7,000,000 it is found of no value for any purpose. We have had the Portage Canal. We have had canals all over the country. But to-day they have little bearing upon the freight rates of the country, because we have passed laws now that give to the Interstate Commerce Commission power to determine when railroad rates are unreasonable. Railroad freight rates can not be raised when they have once been reduced to water-competitive rates without showing present rates would otherwise be confiscatory. That being so, this canal project must be purely for the purpose of accommodating the city of Baltimore.

It occurs to me there ought to be no great objection if Baltimore pays its share. We have throughout this bill and elsewhere, as was cited by the gentleman from Boston, projects where local interests contribute part of the cost. Boston appropriated $9,000,000 for the improvement of conditions at that port. If we appropriate $8,000,000 here for this project, let Baltimore appropriate $4,000,000, which will be one-half the total expense. Why should not that condition be imposed before we pay one dollar toward this project?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] does not know anything about this proposition. [Laughter.]

Mr. FREAR. Thank you. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMALL. His admission is that he began only a day before this bill was taken up for consideration to study the various reports upon which this bill was drafted. This committee has been studying these reports since the first Monday in December and prior thereto, and I think they are just as conscientious, if not as able and as learned, as the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Now, what are the facts about this waterway connecting the Chesapeake Bay and the Delaware River? Mr. Chairman, it has been discussed for a hundred years. For 25 years it has been an active proposition, and hundreds, aye, thousands of men, both in public life and in private life, men interested in the development of our commerce, have expressed the opinion that it was one of the most important arteries of commerce and ought to be made a free waterway. And yet the gentleman from Wisconsin says that it is valueless and ought not to be included in this bill.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman should not quote me that way. I did not say that.

Mr. SMALL. Do I understand the gentleman to say it is a valuable waterway?

Mr. FREAR. I say the Government ought not to be obliged to possess it without a contribution from the city of Baltimore.

Mr. SMALL. Oh, it is a question of contribution that is in the gentleman's mind?

Mr. FREAR. It is just the same principle that ought to apply in regard to the gentleman's own State in connection with the intercoastal canal.

Mr. SMALL. The gentleman's only objection is that there is no contribution provided from the city of Baltimore, we will say, and the city of Philadelphia.

Now, Mr. Chairman, just upon that point, let me say that the question of local cooperation is based upon well-defined limitations, and where there is a waterway which affects interstate commerce, which is a through highway for water carriers, it is not regarded as one proper for local cooperation. This is distinctly an interstate waterway. It affects the commerce of the entire Atlantic seaboard, and it would be unfair and unjust to tax any particular locality with the expense of a project in which the entire country is interested. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman spoke about this project slightingly. It is a project for a waterway 12 feet in depth, with 90 feet bottom width; and, based upon the estimated cost of the purchase of this waterway plus the cost of improvement, the total estimated cost being $8,000,000, but based upon the amount carried in this bill for purchase of this canal the total cost is reduced to $6,685,710.

The gentleman was reading from an old report——

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there——

Mr. SMALL. Whereas I am reading from the latest report.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. Yes.

Mr. FREAR. Does the gentleman add the $450,000 that the Government has already spent upon this project?

Mr. SMALL. I want to bring to the attention of the Chair and to the attention of the Members of the House who have studied this question the latest report, which the gentleman has not even seen.

Mr. FREAR. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I have it here.

Mr. SMALL. Then why did you not quote from it instead of quoting from the report that was displaced by it?

Mr. FREAR. I have it here.

Mr. SMALL. The gentleman is not dealing fairly with the House.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, has the gentleman from Wisconsin told us yet what report he was reading from? He has thus far refused to tell us what he was reading from.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I said——

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I decline to yield further.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. SMALL. I am reading from House Document No. 196, Sixty-third Congress, first session, submitted August 9, 1913, which is the latest report on this project and which contains the project adopted and recommended by the committee as contained in this bill.

Now, Mr. Chairman, just a word as to the merits of this waterway. I will give you a few brief excerpts from the report of the engineers. They say that the purchase of this canal would result immediately in the abolition of tolls.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, may I have five minutes more?

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, the Board of Engineers says that the purchase of this canal will result in the abolition of tolls amounting annually to $163,000, and this will be followed at once by a substantial increase in the amount of traffic. They say further——

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from North Carolina yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. SMALL. Just for a question.

Mr. FREAR. Has the gentleman figured up what the interest on $6,000,000 is as compared with that and over $7,200,000?

Mr. SMALL. I am coming to that. The Board of Engineers further estimate that from the reports received the following existing commerce would use the free canal. Now listen: Shipments from southern ports, 1,107,414 tons; shipments from northern ports, 1,438,208 tons, making a total commerce of 2,537,622 tons, with a total valuation of $14,170,239. The Board of Engineers further say that the average annual shipments through this canal——

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I notice in all these engineers' reports and in all these discussions they discuss the actual value of the freight carried. If the freight was gold, its value might be millions of dollars and the cost of carriage could be expressed in cents. If it was brick, the value might be thousands of dollars, and the freight would nearly equal the value. I want to know why they always state the value of the freight carried rather than the actual expense of carrying the freight.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, answering that question I will say that the usual method of statement is to give the tonnage and also the value, and that is the way I am giving it here.

Mr. CALLAWAY. The public is not concerned about the value of the freight carried. The public is concerned, however, about the cost of carrying the freight. These figures are simply delusions, so far as the public are concerned, and give no information at all.

Mr. SMALL. If the gentleman will pardon me, I will give him the details. The engineers further say that the average annual shipment through this canal for the past five years has been 716,644 tons, paying an average annual toll of $163,000, or an average of 22¾ cents per ton. This will answer the gentleman's question. Therefore, applying this rate to the traffic which would use the free canal, there would be an annual saving of tolls of $577,309. In addition they say the saving on freight would be 21¾ cents per ton, or an annual saving of $551,933, showing a total annual saving, if we could have a free canal, of $1,414,242. These figures will be found in the report of the engineers.

Mr. CALLAWAY. I can not understand——

Mr. SMALL. I hope the gentleman will only interrupt me for a question as I have a very short time left.

Mr. CALLAWAY. I can not understand how that will cheapen the freight rate 20 cents a ton. I understand they have water rates to Philadelphia and Baltimore, and how they can cheapen these deep-water rates by this canal is a thing I can not understand.

Mr. SMALL. In answer to that, all I can say is that, in view of the gentleman's usual clear understanding, I can not understand why he can not understand this. [Laughter.] I have just quoted from the report of the engineers that the saving on freight rates would be 21¾ cents per ton and the saving in tolls 22¾ cents per ton, and applying that to the tonnage using the free canal it would amount to an annual saving of $1,414,242.

Mr. CALLAWAY. The engineers say that will be the saving. Why will it save that? By what means will it be saved? By what operation will it be saved?

Mr. SMALL. I might have quoted—although I did not take the time—the report of the engineers also as to the loss of shipping, the loss of lives, and the loss of cargo by vessels taking the outside route; vessels which would and could have used this canal if it had been a free canal and had been improved as it is proposed.

Mr. FREAR. I would like to ask the gentleman whether he has any statistics as to the character of the vessels that have been lost there? There is nothing in the engineer's report. It simply mentions the fact that they were lost.

Mr. SMALL. I beg the gentleman's pardon. There is a description of the vessel, the tonnage of the vessel, the tonnage of the cargo, and the value of the cargo, all that is contained in the report. And it may be said in addition that by this canal 320 miles would be saved over the outside route from Baltimore to Philadelphia.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to speak.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair calls attention to the fact that under the rules one speech for and one against an amendment exhausts the debate, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. MOORE. I ask unanimous consent for 10 minutes to speak on this question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] asks unanimous consent for 10 minutes' time. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I am not going to object to the request of the gentleman for unanimous consent, but I am going to serve notice now that all the rest of the day, and all during the remainder of the consideration of this bill I shall object to the extension of any time beyond the five minutes allotted under the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I am going to object. Let the objections start right now. I object to the gentleman's request.

Mr. MOORE. Why, Mr. Chairman, it is too late. The gentleman is entirely too late. The Chairman had recognized me.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the objection comes too late. The Chair put the question to the committee and there was no objection. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, what did you do with my objection?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has overruled it as coming too late. The Chair is just as anxious as anybody possibly can be to enforce this rule, and he calls attention to the fact that under the rules one speech for an amendment and one against it exhausts the debate on that amendment, and after that debate can only proceed by unanimous consent. So, with reference to the motion to strike out the last word, a Member having exhausted his time on a pro forma amendment, may not lengthen this time by then making another pro forma amendment. His time can not then be extended except by unanimous consent. (Hinds' Precedents, vol. 5, 5222.)

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. May I inquire whether or not after a pro forma amendment has been withdrawn it may be renewed by another Member than the one who has spoken on it?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not very clear on that question, because there has been no uniformity of procedure; but the rule is this, that the pro forma amendment to strike out the last word has only been used for purposes of debate where an actual amendment was not contemplated; but a Member who has occupied five minutes on a pro forma amendment may not lengthen his time by making another pro forma amendment.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. I am afraid I did not make myself quite clear. Assuming that I have made a pro forma amendment to strike out the last word, and have occupied five minutes on that pro forma amendment, and then at the end of that time I withdraw that pro forma amendment, are we to understand——

The CHAIRMAN. Then the gentleman can not make another pro forma amendment to strike out the last two words.

Mr. MURDOCK. But suppose I rise and offer that amendment?

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. Suppose the gentleman from Kansas or any other gentleman, after I have withdrawn the pro forma amendment, rises and renews the pro forma amendment; is this ruling of the Chair to be taken to mean that no Member of the committee may renew it under the rule?

The CHAIRMAN. If that were true the debate might be extended ad infinitum.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the pro forma amendment can only be withdrawn by unanimous consent. If anyone objects, it has to be voted upon. If it has been voted upon it can be renewed.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. I have no interest in prolonging the debate, but I wanted to get for my own satisfaction the ruling of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has no right to withdraw the pro forma amendment except by unanimous consent.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachussets. But if it is withdrawn it may be renewed by some other Member.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that has been the practice of the House. The Chair has not ruled upon it.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MURDOCK. Is not the ordinary practice or procedure for a Member to rise and move to strike out the last word, take 5 minutes, and then some one speak in opposition?

The CHAIRMAN. That has been the practice.

Mr. MURDOCK. And there is nothing in the rule against it.

The CHAIRMAN. Nothing that the Chair knows of.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, this is the language written in the House Manual: "He can not lengthen the time by making another pro forma amendment." Now, once to address the Chair is all he has a right to, and he can not lengthen his argument by making another pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has already called attention to the rule.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, am I recognized for 10 minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. MURDOCK. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MURDOCK. What is the gentleman from Pennsylvania speaking on?

The CHAIRMAN. He is proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. MURDOCK. And there is no amendment pending?

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. MOORE. Is the gentleman from Kansas now satisfied?

Mr. MURDOCK. I am. I wanted to understand the procedure.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I have taken the trouble to produce this map in order to fully explain the Delaware & Chesapeake proposition. Two gentlemen have spoken upon it—the gentleman from Wisconsin, who seems to object most strenuously, and has read from some old report about which he was not clear, and the gentleman from North Carolina, who is advocating the proposition.

Mr. FREAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE. Yes.

Mr. FREAR. "The gentleman from Wisconsin is not clear" in what respect?

Mr. MOORE. He did not seem to know from what report he was reading.

Mr. FREAR. I did; but I could not give the gentleman the year, because I did not have the time.

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman declined on several occasions to identify the report. Mr. Chairman, I want to explain this project to the satisfaction of the gentleman from Wisconsin, because the gentleman from Wisconsin is an intelligent Member, and I want him to be fully informed even as to those waterway improvements which he thinks are not useful.

I call his attention to the fact that in the early part of the last century there was no railroad transportation, which is now supposed to control and monopolize the business of the country; that then transportation, except by dirt road, was done by the waterways; and that the citizens then depended almost wholly upon waterways for the movement of heavy merchandise. This was particularly so along the Atlantic seaboard. It is rather interesting to know that the State of South Carolina back in 1805 was the premier State of canal development in the United States. The Erie Canal came along later, because there were some far-seeing statesmen who believed it possible to utilize the Mohawk Valley and the Hudson River to bring the Great Lakes to the sea. They did that, and that was the beginning of the supremacy of New York as a metropolis and as the greatest port in this country.

At the time the Erie Canal was constructed there were in operation many other canals doing business along the Atlantic seaboard, because the population had not gone west. After the Erie Canal came other canals which the business men of those times thought it wise to construct. Among these—Mr. Chairman, I ask for order.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order.

Mr. DONOVAN. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. MOORE. If the gentleman from Connecticut will be quiet for a little while and let me proceed. I will let him ask all the questions he wants to. The gentleman is obstreperous; he ought not to break in just now when I am trying to make a sensible talk.

Among the canals that came along after the Erie Canal was the Chesapeake & Delaware, and it followed those laid out by our forefathers, of whom George Washington was one—and his interest in canals was particular and especial because it was he who surveyed the Lake Drummond Canal area down through Virginia waters.

The Chesapeake & Delaware Canal was commenced about 1824. It was the result of far-seeing judgment on the part of business men and statesmen, who thought there should be some better connecting link between the North and the South than [indicating on map] the tremendous outside sailing course from the Delaware River around by the way of Cape Henlopen and Cape Charles up to Baltimore, Washington, and other points. The greater part of the business of the country then was done along the Atlantic seaboard. Originating at points like Philadelphia and points like Baltimore for shipment from one to the other in those days meant a 100-mile run down the Delaware River, through the shoals in the bay first, on out by Cape May and Cape Henlopen, into the ocean; thence down the eastern shore of Maryland and the eastern shore of Virginia; thence around this peninsula [indicating on the map] into Hampton Roads, on up the Chesapeake Bay into the Potomac River if they were going to Washington, and up the Patapsco if they were going to Baltimore.

The distance between Philadelphia and Baltimore by that route is 420 miles, and the distance by canal, since the people were wise enough to cut that canal through the upper neck of the peninsula, is only 13 miles. The distance as the bird flies, from Philadelphia to Baltimore, is about 95 miles. Therefore, 325 miles of outside sailing for steamboats or sailing craft was saved by this canal strip, which is 13 miles long. That was the strip these men cut through, and they put it through after it had been carefully surveyed by the old-time surveyors, who found it to be the most feasible route through which a canal could be cut. The construction work was done in the old-fashioned method without such modern machinery as we now have at Panama and on other great projects, with the pick and spade, the horse and the cart, and it was finished at that in four years. The farmers of the vicinity dug that canal, and they opened up a splendid passageway for merchant craft between not Philadelphia and Baltimore only but between the Delaware Bay and all points north and the Chesapeake Bay and all points south.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE. Yes.

Mr. FREAR. And there was a contribution from the Government of $450,000 and also a contribution from the State of Pennsylvania?

Mr. MOORE. Yes; because in those days the Government encouraged projects of that character as it was necessary for the progress of the race.

Mr. FREAR. There are not to exceed 10 or 15 feet of excavation, as against several hundred feet at Panama?

Mr. MOORE. Panama is to be 40 feet deep at the miter sill, and this canal is now 9 feet deep. The proposition here is to make it 12 feet deep. The gentleman made a great "mare's nest" of what he read a little while ago, of an alleged cost of $20,000,000. Will the gentleman permit me to say that he was reading from a report proposing a 35-foot channel?

Mr. FREAR. Twenty-five foot.

Mr. MOORE. Thirty-five foot; I beg the gentleman's pardon. I know what I am talking about—a 35-foot channel over a distance of 13 miles, between two bodies of water not yet 35 feet deep; and as I read that report, or as I read the motives of those who inserted a 35-foot provision into that bill, I think I saw a cloven foot. Some one may have desired to destroy an active working canal between the Delaware and the Chesapeake Bay, in the interest not of commerce, but in the interest of controlling factors of transportation along the Atlantic seaboard, which the gentleman opposes out in his own State of Wisconsin. They asked for too much. It looked like a case of the Greeks bearing gifts. The Federal commission reported upon it, as it was its duty to do. That was for a ship-canal depth. But now, when we come before the House with a reasonable proposition, to start somewhere on a reaonable basis at a reasonable cost, at a 12-foot depth at a cost of $8,000,000, the gentleman rises up with this report for a 35-foot project and harries us with his extraordinary figures.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE. I can not yield just now. I would gladly yield if the gentleman would get me more time. The gentleman from Wisconsin discovers something in an old report which he thinks ought to be used to defeat a laudable and proper proposition, contemplating a waterway link between the North and the South and the binding up of more than thirty millions of people who do business along this seaboard from Maine to Florida, and who during the last 10 years, as I said a day or two ago, have suffered a loss of 2,200 lives and $40,000,000 worth of property in the 5,700 disasters that have occurred by reason of outside sailing. Gentlemen who come from the mountain tops or from the Texas sand dunes do not know that there is a loss of life and property along this coast that might be saved if they would use a little intelligence in making appropriations for the opening up of proper means of communication for the welfare and the benefit of the people. What does this canal contemplate? It is to take over and make free a canal charging tolls—tolls that are equal to those that are charged by the railroads that parallel it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MOORE. Very well, if I can not have any more time, I must stop.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes more. This is very interesting to all of us.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. FREAR. Make it 10 minutes.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I shall object to 10 minutes.

Mr. FREAR. This is a large proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania be extended for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I object. I have no objection to five minutes, and I ask unanimous consent that the time be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I have not time in five minutes to quote any of the statistics with regard to this important area. I resent the thought that this is a sectional project, that it is solely for the benefit of Baltimore or for the benefit of Philadelphia or for the benefit of any other one particular community. This is as national a project as there is in the rivers and harbors bill. It is one great test of the power of this Government to improve navigation and to reduce transportation costs for the benefit of the people, North and South. We take the raw cotton from the South, and we pay tremendously for it in freight charges that have to be paid when we get it up into the New England mills. We take the lumber out of Virginia, Alabama, Georgia, North and South Carolina, and we use it all over the Central States and in New England, and we have to pay tremendously for the freight costs of getting it to our lumber yards and into our buildings. It is as much for your convenience to get this water connection, as much for your benefit to cut off these extraordinary freight charges, as it is for us. We send down our fertilizer and machinery, and they ought to have some consideration in the matter of freight charges.

Mr. FREAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE. I will.

Mr. FREAR. Is not the outside passage open to-day as it has always been?

Mr. MOORE. Yes; and the gentleman is like a number of others who have said the ocean is but "a biscuit's throw"—oh, how the changes have been rung upon it—a biscuit's throw! The gentleman does not seem to understand that the barge traffic has come to stay; that the sailing vessel is passing out; that the ocean carrier is monopolizing everything and may itself be controlled by monopoly; and he does not seem to understand the individual operator of barges is the solution of the transportation question along the coast.

Mr. FREAR. Is not the result exactly contrary at the Erie Canal?

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman may know, but he would not permit me to tell him, and certainly the gentleman from Texas would not, that the Erie Canal did the business for the Great Lakes until the railroads came along and paralleled it on either side and took the business away. I want to say to the gentlemen that it is in the interest of the railroads to prevent resumption of business upon the Erie Canal. If gentlemen want to stop that, they stop it in the interest of the greatest factor of transportation of the country to-day, the railroads.

But I was going to say this, that there is more commerce along the Atlantic Coast to the Gulf States and the southern Mississippi than there is in all the world besides. I want to say that along the Atlantic seaboard there is more than one-third of all the population of this great country. To those who are opposing the improvement of waterways along the coast for the relief of commerce I want to say that the more than 33,000,000 of people along that coast—more than one-third of our population in the smallest area—have less than one-fourth of the railroad mileage of the country. Oh, you have got trunk lines coming and going down in Texas; you have trunk lines coming and going at St. Louis; you have seven or eight at Seattle; but along the Atlantic coast we have one or two, and up yonder in Boston, that creates commerce and sends it to you and takes your raw material, they have but one, and their annual fuel bill is $100,000,000 for that business. They pay that for $30,000,000 worth of coal at the mines, and you here who would refuse to open the Cape Cod Canal or who would refuse to open this canal make these people pay $70,000,000 a year for the privilege of getting your coal. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I served notice a few moments ago that I would object to any Member proceeding longer than the rules provided—five minutes. I shall continue to insist that the rules be complied with all day long and during the consideration of this bill.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield? I would like to make a statement to the gentleman. After the gentleman made that statement the time was extended and to the gentleman from Pennsylvania for five minutes as well.

Mr. MADDEN. I was not here.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to perfect the paragraph by striking out the last two words, and the gentleman from Texas can address himself to my amendment.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. MOORE. The point of order is that this paragraph has been passed and it is too late.

Mr. FREAR. That is not fair; the gentleman ought to be willing to give the extra time.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion was made to strike out the paragraph, and that motion is now pending.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Very well, let that be put, and then I will move to strike out the last word.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman can not move to strike out the last word, but my motion is now pending.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, just one moment. I want to say that the committee has no disposition to unduly limit debate on this paragraph. This is one of the important items of the bill, and the committee is desirous of having a reasonable debate upon it, and hence I have not up to the present time been objecting——

Mr. MANN. Can not we agree upon some time?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MANN. I have made my motion; I do not desire to use five minutes. I am willing that the gentleman from Texas——

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman can not yield time obtained under the five-minute rule.

Mr. MANN. I am not; I have not yielded the time. There is a motion pending, and the gentleman from Texas has the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not understand that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] had yielded the time.

Mr. MANN. I did not yield the time. I yielded the floor so that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY] might be recognized in his own right.

Mr. CALLAWAY. And I speak in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY] will proceed.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I want to address myself to the question of striking out the entire paragraph instead of the last two words.

Mr. MURDOCK. The last two words do not go far enough.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, the particular project proposed by this paragraph—of cutting a canal 12 feet deep from the Chesapeake to the Delaware Bay—is not really vital in this movement. The real question in this movement is cutting this as one of the segments of an intercoastal waterway on which the engineers have reported, leading from Boston, Mass., to the Rio Grande River, a line of transportation that is something like 2,500 miles long. This canal is an unthinkable through freight project, for the reason that the engineers' reports show that one segment of it is to be 12 feet deep, another segment in this canal at another place is to be 25 feet deep, another segment 8 feet deep, and another segment at some other place will be 5 feet deep.

Mr. SMALL. May I ask the gentleman where the segment is?

Mr. CALLAWAY. I can not yield. I have not the time. If you give me more time to discuss this thing, I will yield to you all the time you desire.

When this canal gets around to the Rio Grande River on the southern coast of Texas they are going to have a 5-foot canal. A 5-foot canal over there, they say, will be a good thing; when the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] tells you that a 9-foot canal here between Baltimore and Philadelphia is worthless; when the citizenship of New York up there have voted for improving the Erie Canal, a 7-foot canal from Buffalo to New York, leading from the Great Lakes to the Atlantic Ocean, which is worthless, and they voted $1,500,000 to make that a 12-foot canal; when the fact is that a 14-foot canal, the Welland Canal, has been tried in Canada and found to be worthless there in competition with the railroads. They are contemplating abandoning a 14-foot canal there and digging a 25-foot canal that will carry the lake steamers.

Now, then, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] claims that this is going to shorten transportation between Baltimore and Philadelphia. On what? Will it shorten the transportation of the ocean-going steamer? Oh, no. They can not pass a 12-foot canal. An ocean steamer will be as helpless, so far as going from Philadelphia to Baltimore is concerned, with a 12-foot canal as it is to-day with a 9-foot canal, because such vessels draw more water than that. He says that some cloven foot is revealed in the scheme of proposing to dig a 35-foot canal. The cloven foot is revealed to any man who has studied this question by this proposition to make a 12-foot canal; they are trying to get 35 feet at Baltimore and at Philadelphia. And when you get that the proposition will be to deepen this canal, that fails to accommodate the commerce coming to Baltimore and Philadelphia, and make it a 35-foot canal across that little strip of 12 miles, in order that these ocean steamers will not have to go down around from Chesapeake Bay and into the Delaware Bay and cross the ocean.

Now, the whole thing is this, and you can not dodge it: You will not tell the people the truth nor half the truth. If the truth was told of the distribution of money from the Federal Treasury along the Atlantic seaboard, it would be shown that the population is moving toward the interior, where the wealth is produced; it would be found that these Atlantic seaboard fellows are taking fits on account of that; and they want to hold the population, to hold the manufacturers, hold the business they have had heretofore, by holding the business on the Atlantic seaboard and offering inducements to citizens to stay along the Atlantic seaboard. That is the whole scheme. They do not expect ever to develop any commerce in these canals. No. The Erie Canal has gone out of business. The other canals have gone out of business. We had originally 5,000 miles of canals in this country. They ranged on the average from 3 feet to 20 feet. We have abandoned 2,444 miles of them. More than half the canals have been abandoned because they were found useless. Railroad companies have used canals paralleled by railroad lines, and the companies that owned the canals have closed them up and then carried the freight over the railroad lines. Do you mean to tell me that a railroad company that owns a canal and a railroad conveying coal from the company's mines to tidewater, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT] told you Saturday, that they would abandon the canal unless they could carry the coal cheaper by rail? That is the history of canals in this country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, speaking in support of the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]——

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman from Texas have five minutes more.

Mr. MADDEN. I object, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] objects.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, having in mind the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] that we in New England have long been at the mercy of a great transportation monopoly, let me direct the attention of Members to the agreement that has just been announced between the Department of Justice and the officials of the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad Co.

It is a matter of some surprise to me that this agreement has not been previously referred to during the discussion of this measure. I believe that it is the greatest and most complete victory for the Government that anyone of us has ever known. [Applause.]

There have been incidents in connection with the conduct of the Department of Justice that have attracted very great attention in this House of Representatives. Some things have happened in the course of the last year in connection with the Department of Justice that were made the basis of many speeches in this Chamber. But, Mr. Chairman, when an agreement is announced between the Attorney General and this great transportation monopoly to which reference has been made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] no criticism at all is heard.

I wonder if that is not because any honest criticism of this agreement must include a great tribute of admiration and sincere congratulation of the Attorney General, Mr. McReynolds. The critics of other days should now be honest with themselves and give us their opinion of the achievement that is coupled with this agreement.

It is true that we have had a bad transportation monopoly in New England. It is true that one group of men have had control not only of the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad Co., of the Boston & Maine Railroad Co., and of trolley companies in New England States, but they have also had control of practically all of the water transportation companies in the coastwise trade that send ships out of the port of Boston. And in the distribution of the production of the factories of New England, our manufacturers and our shippers have been badly handicapped because of the service they have received.

It is no new condition of affairs to which I refer, Mr. Chairman, and gentlemen here must be thoroughly familiar with the details of the situation. They know that as long ago as in 1908 the President of the United States, Theodore Roosevelt, directed the Attorney General, Charles J. Bonaparte, to bring a suit for dissolution under the Sherman Act against the New Haven Railroad Co. And they know that the suit begun in 1908 was discontinued in 1909, less than six months after President Taft and Attorney General Wickersham assumed their offices.

I have great respect for these gentlemen, and I shall not do more than state the simple facts—suit was begun in 1908 and discontinued in 1909.

These gentlemen know better than any of us the difficulties of the work that Mr. McReynolds has done. And they must know that much of the loss to stockholders of these properties and the hardship to the shippers of New England could have been averted during the past five years if they had stood firm and determined in this matter, as Mr. McReynolds has surely done.

This agreement means that trustees shall soon take control of the Boston & Maine Railroad, with the purpose to sell it by January, 1917. The trustees for this work have been named, and they are Marcus P. Knowlton, a former chief justice of the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts; James L. Richards, a great leader in New England financial circles, officer and director of many public-service corporations, who has shown himself to be of the best type; James L. Doherty, formerly city solicitor of the city of Springfield, Mass., an able lawyer; Charles P. Hall, prominently identified with the shoe and leather trade of New England and with the Public Franchise League; and Frank P. Carpenter, a public-spirited citizen of New Hampshire, who is well known throughout New England because of his benefactions and his identity with many business companies.

The agreement provides that trustees, who have not yet been named, shall take over and sell, before July 1, 1919, trolley lines now owned by the New Haven in the States of Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Vermont, Connecticut, and New York; the majority stock of the Merchants & Miners' Transportation Co., now held by the New Haven, shall be sold by trustees by July 1, 1917; the minority stock of the Eastern Steamship Co., now held by the New Haven, shall be deprived of voting power and shall be sold by July 1, 1917; and the Interstate Commerce Commission shall determine, under the provisions of the Panama Canal act which we passed in the last Congress, whether or not the New Haven shall be permitted to retain the Sound lines of steamships.

The arrangement that has existed between the New Haven and the New York Central, lessee of the Boston & Albany, under which arrangement there has existed practically a partnership between the owners of these two companies, has already been terminated by the Department of Justice. That partnership ended February 1 of this year.

Mr. Chairman, the victory for the Government and the people of the United States is complete. The Attorney General has been the leader in the movement, and, like a wise leader, he has surrounded himself with a few fearless lieutenants, whose work has been important, even if it may have been inconspicuous.

We know the intelligent, persistent, well-directed activities of the gentlemen who have represented Mr. McReynolds in much of this work, Mr. T. W. Gregory and Mr. Jesse C. Adkins. Like the Attorney General, they do not belong to New England, but we of New England are grateful to them for their work in our behalf.

And we know the value of the services of a few Massachusetts men whose work has been of real assistance to the Attorney General. Gov. Walsh will be remembered as a great governor of Massachusetts, if his claim to greatness is rested entirely on his contribution to the settlement of this bothersome question. [Applause.] The governor's personal representative on the Massachusetts public-service commission, Mr. George W. Anderson, has been very efficient in his attention to all of this business. And without any public office, with no cause to be concerned other than the sincere devotion of a citizen to his State, Mr. Louis D. Brandeis has done more in this work than most statesmen are able to accomplish. [Applause.]

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I think much of the criticism of this appropriation is very unjust. If there is a good provision in this bill, it is the one that——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will suggest that all debate on this paragraph has been exhausted.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Florida have five minutes in which to proceed.

Mr. MADDEN. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] objects. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] to strike out the last two words.

The question was taken, and the motion was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY], to strike out the paragraph.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 17, noes 77.

So the motion to strike out the paragraph was rejected.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. FREAR. That is to be added at the conclusion of the paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 14, at the end of line 11, insert the following:

"Provided, however, That prior to the expenditure of any money by the Government toward the purchase or improvement of this canal there shall be paid into the United States Treasury, subject to the order of the Secretary of War, by the States, municipalities, or communities specially interested, the sum of $10,000,000, which is one-half of the full estimated cost of such canal project, and the Secretary of War shall use the proceeds so contributed in equal proportion with those appropriated, or hereafter to be appropriated, by the Government toward the completion of such project; all moneys so contributed and remaining unexpended after the completion of such project shall be set aside for a fund for the continued maintenance of such canal, after first deducting the sum therefrom of $450,000, heretofore contributed by the Government toward the construction of such canal, together with interest thereon at 4 per cent from the date of such contribution; and all money so refunded to the Government shall be deposited in the United States Treasury for general purposes."

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DONOVAN. The gentleman can not make that motion until there has been five minutes' debate, under the rules.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is not making a motion. He is asking unanimous consent.

Mr. DONOVAN. He is making a motion to close debate.

The CHAIRMAN. He is asking unanimous consent.

Mr. DONOVAN. Then I shall object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN] asks unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. DONOVAN. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut objects.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, before addressing myself strictly to the amendment, I wish to state that in yesterday's paper appears a statement to the effect that the effort to enlighten the House upon the propositions contained in this bill are purely filibustering, and that the attempt——

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I object to the gentleman discussing anything outside of this bill and amendments to the bill.

Mr. MADDEN. The statement of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] is not in order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. FREAR. It is directly on this bill.

Mr. SPARKMAN. The gentleman should rise to a question of personal privilege if he wishes to make that statement. That is more nearly stating his position than anything else.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has not yet been out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was not following the course of the debate and can not determine. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. FREAR. I will say, Mr. Chairman, in response to that that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS] said on Saturday in pure courtesy:

So far as the committee is concerned, we have no quarrel with the gentleman, except this: That if he picks out a few items and they are voted down, it is unfair then for him to say, "Now, these are samples, and the bill is full of them." I think the gentleman ought to continue to present his propositions, so that the committee can give whatever explanation it has of them, so that the country may judge whether or not this bill is framed upon proper lines.

We all concede that that is a fair statement, coming from the gentleman from Mississippi, and it is with that in mind that I am addressing myself to a few of the objectionable features which, in my judgment, exist in the bill.

Now, Mr. Chairman, referring to this proposition, the gentleman [Mr. TREADWAY] who desires to succeed me in the discussion resides in a State that we are told contributed $9,000,000 toward the $12,000,000 more expended by the Government in Boston Harbor. It is a desirable feature, as shown by the report of this committee, to have all these various communities, so far as possible, contribute to river or harbor improvements. Here is a proposition which directly affects Philadelphia and Baltimore—practically no other city at present, at any rate—and it is no more than fair, inasmuch as the Government is to contribute generously to this canal, that these communities should adopt the same plan as was adopted in Massachusetts and in other cases that you have pointed out in your report. In other words, the city of Philadelphia and the city of Baltimore should give such contribution as may be fair toward the construction of the canal, which it is agreed will cost $7,200,000, and that is only part of a large intracoastal system.

This proposition to dig a deep channel has been laughed at here. It is said that this is not to be a 35-foot canal. Not now; but we know that it is impossible to carry shipping through that canal, for it will be navigable only by small boats. A further question arises. Here is a proposition to pay $1,300,000 for the canal. Who owns the canal, and who owns the stock and the bonds? Who is to get this money? We know nothing about it. The engineers recommend over $2,000,000. It would seem that if Baltimore is interested and if Philadelphia is interested it is their duty to contribute at least one-half of the cost.

I do not care to discuss this proposition further, Mr. Chairman; I do not care to add to it. My position is made plain.

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman has asked the question, "Who owns the canal?" I will answer, it is owned by a private company, the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal Co.

Mr. FREAR. Who are the stockholders?

Mr. MOORE. We have not been able to ascertain, but the list of stockholders is supposed to embrace about 500 people. It is a company that has been doing business since 1824. A tonnage in the hundreds of thousands has been going through ever since its beginning. It now pays interest on its bonds at 4 per cent.

Mr. FREAR. What is the value of the stock?

Mr. MOORE. It is practically worthless. I want the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] to know and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY] to know that about 1,000,000 tons of traffic went through that canal last year. The company does not want to sell its property, so far as we know. The engineers in their report which has just been quoted in part——

Mr. FREAR. I could not quote it entire——

Mr. MOORE. The engineers in their first report estimated the value of the property at $2,514,000. The committee has cut that down to $1,300,000. The bondholders may not accept that. We are considering larger public interests now.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. MOORE. I regret I have not control of the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. CALLAWAY. I wanted to put in a word there and ask a question of the gentleman.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] has the floor.

Mr. MOORE. I have here the ninety-fourth annual report of this company.

Mr. FREAR. I have read three different reports, and endeavored to get all the information I could; but I was addressing myself to the $20,000,000. It is the probabilities that are urged in this case that are important and those probabilities comprehend a deep-water canal.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR].

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I shall take but a very few moments on this proposition, because I think it has been very fully debated and the merits of it have been amply shown.

But I do wish to call attention to one or two remarkable statements, which, I think, are made through some misconception of what the proposition is.

Twice the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] has referred to the cost of this canal as being $20,000,000. Now, the Committee on Rivers and Harbors has reported an appropriation of $1,300,000, and the total estimate of the engineers for the completed canal at a depth of 12 feet is $8,000,000; but in that $8,000,000 there was included the cost of this canal at about twice what the committee has appropriated, consequently the estimate now for the completed canal, 12 feet in depth, is $6,785,710. That seems to me to be conclusive evidence as to what the Government will finally be asked to pay for this canal. Where the gentleman gets his idea of $20,000,000, I do not know.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. For a brief question. I want to use my own time.

Mr. CALLAWAY. You propose to appropriate $1,300,000 for the purchase of this canal, but the report from the Commissioner of Corporations——

Mr. TREADWAY. I only yielded for a question.

Mr. CALLAWAY. I want to ask a question. The report of the Commissioner of Corporations gives the indebtedness on this canal as $4,199,500.

Mr. TREADWAY. We are assuming no indebtedness. We are offering $1,300,000 for the purchase of the canal, and the engineers estimate that to dig that from 9 feet, which it now is, to 12 feet, will cost the difference between that sum and $6,785,000, or about $5,000,000, to increase the depth to 12 feet.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. MURDOCK. Is the contention of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] correct that if this canal is afterwards dug to a depth of 35 feet it will cost $20,000,000?

Mr. TREADWAY. I suppose you could get an estimate on the depth if you dug it as deep as from here to China, but the proposition here is for a barge canal.

Mr. MURDOCK. That was the statement of the gentleman from Wisconsin——

Mr. FREAR. Is not $20,000,000 the estimate for a 35-foot canal?

Mr. TREADWAY. I will not make myself responsible for that. The gentleman must assume responsibility for those figures. We are talking about a depth of 12 feet.

Mr. FREAR. Is not that the estimate?

Mr. MURDOCK. The total cost for a 12-foot canal will be $8,000,000, will it?

Mr. TREADWAY. It will be $6,785,710.

Mr. MURDOCK. Together with the purchase price of the canal?

Mr. TREADWAY. No; including the purchase price of the canal. The estimate of the engineers was $8,000,000 when we were to pay $2,500,000 for the canal. Or rather, that was the estimate of the engineers of the value of the canal. The estimate that the committee has placed on the value of the canal is $1,300,000. Consequently there is a saving of $1,200,000 in the cost of the canal 12 feet deep.

Mr. MURDOCK. That will make the total cost what?

Mr. TREADWAY. That will make the total cost $6,785,710, practically one-third of the amount estimated by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR].

Mr. MURDOCK. For 12 feet.

Mr. TREADWAY. For 12 feet; and 12 feet is the depth that is wanted. Gentlemen do not seem to realize the difference between ocean travel and inland travel on these barge canals. The great inland movement of commerce can be carried on by barge canals at a depth of 12 feet.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY] also made an erroneous statement in that he said the Erie Canal had been deserted. Why, Mr. Chairman, instead of the Erie Canal being deserted, it has been increased in depth and the State of New York has bonded itself for $101,000,000, which amount is now being expended in order to give them the kind of commerce across the State of New York that the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] described as being the means of lowering the cost of transportation. That is what we are asking.

Mr. CALLAWAY. I did not state that the Erie Canal had been deserted by the Treasury. I stated that it had been deserted by freight.

Mr. TREADWAY. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the people of the State of New York have some sense. They are not going to pay $101,000,000 of the taxpayers' money if it is to be of no use and benefit to the people of the State and of the Nation. [Applause.] You can not argue that the people of the State of New York will vote to waste their own money.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TREADWAY. I have been interrupted so much that I ask for three minutes more.

Mr. MADDEN. I object. I served notice that I would object to further extensions.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois objects. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Curtis Bay Channel, Baltimore Harbor, Md., in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 7, Sixty-third Congress, first session, $61,850.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. To my surprise the member of the committee from North Carolina, Gov. SMALL, thought proper to ridicule the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] for his lack of information; or, in other words, for willfully misstating a question of fact here. Now, the truth is, Gov. SMALL was talking through his hat, so to speak, because he imposed upon us with this statement, that the moving of freight by boat in this particular barge canal would be a saving of 20 cents per ton. Now, the truth is, as a member of the committee beside him, who is in the boat business, should have told him, that they do not get a cent a ton for moving freight on water in sound or lake. That gentleman has become a millionaire by moving freight at less than a cent a ton, and yet this distinguished gentleman from North Carolina gets up here before this room full and holds up to ridicule the Member from Wisconsin. It is bad enough at best for a man to take his reputation in his hands to oppose the committee's report, without being held up to ridicule and accused of making misstatements, and a member of the committee right beside him is party to it, knowing that what he was saying was false. These coastwise owners have got rich at less than 1 cent per ton, and still they expect a $400,000,000 project to be opened to them without any cost, in addition to it. You can find them down at the Ponce de Leon Hotel in Florida in the winter and in the summer time up at Saratoga Springs, they have got so much money carrying freight at 1 cent per ton. And I will read a statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that most courteous gentleman, Mr. MOORE, of Pennsylvania—I suppose Philadelphia is proper. He, too, listened to that statement in silence.

This is the language of J. HAMPTON MOORE, of Pennsylvania, in the House of Representatives on Tuesday, July 27, 1909. He says in 1906 the average cost per ton-mile on dirt roads by animal power was 25 cents; on steam railroads it was 7.8 cents. Mark the difference on waterways: Canals, from 5 to 10 feet deep, from 2 to 3 mills—not cents but mills; rivers, from 6 to 10 feet deep, 1 mill; lakes and oceans, five-tenths of a mill.

Still he remains silent and allows us to be bunkoed by that. All this rot has come from the gentleman from North Carolina, a member of the Rivers and Harbors Committee, about saving 20 cents a ton by spending several million dollars. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. FREAR. Does the gentleman withdraw his pro forma amendment?

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent to withdraw the pro forma amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto be closed in five minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, if the committee does not care to answer this, very well; I shall read from the report. This report bears out the statement the gentleman from Illinois made Saturday, that the disposition is to increase the depth of all these waterways and to compel the Government to foot the bills. Philadelphia wants what New York has, and Baltimore also wants more water. Curtis Bay is 30 feet deep, and the industries on the bay want additional depth to 35 feet. Now, I read from the report on page 3:

> This bay, on which there are large manufacturing and other industries handling an extensive commerce, is commercially a part of Baltimore Harbor. It uses the same class of large vessels and for its full development should have the same depth as Baltimore Harbor and entrance thereto. It view of all the facts presented, the board concurs with the district officer and the division engineer and reports that in its opinion it is advisable for the United States to undertake the further improvement of Curtis Bay by providing a channel depth of 35 feet at mean low water and a bottom width of 250 feet, at a total estimated cost of $123,700 for first construction and $4,000 annually thereafter for maintenance. The total amount should be provided in one appropriation.

Mr. Chairman, on page 5 appears a statement which shows the character of freight which is carried in and out of that harbor. It consists of fertilizer, coal, and oil. That is practically all the shipment of freight that goes out; it is all owned by private interests, although there is, in addition to that, the recommendation of naval officers, who want 35 feet instead of 30 feet, because they will have to run up to Baltimore, possibly, in case of a war. On page 6 of the report it is said:

> The depth of 34 feet was requested by business interests affected, which realized the inadequacy of the present channel and the necessity for enlargement, but in their desire to secure relief were willing to accept the smallest channel and least depth which could answer the purpose.

Just as these gentlemen here are willing to do on the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal—accept 12 feet now, but ask for 35 feet later.

> 11. The terminal facilities at this place, which are all used exclusively by the various concerns owning them, are ample to handle the commerce, and the character of that commerce is such that the establishment of a public wharf is unnecessary. The oil company's pier is equipped with a pipe line for the delivery of oil in bulk into vessels; the chemical pier on the east side is equipped with cranes, trestles, and cars for unloading raw material; and the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad pier is equipped with trestles and chutes for dumping coal directly from the cars into vessels; 7,483 tons of coal were placed in a vessel from 156 cars in 4 hours and 10 minutes at this pier recently.

Now we are asked, Mr. Chairman, to appropriate $378,000 for that harbor, when you Baltimore people were willing before to accept 30 feet; now they want 35 feet. They want 12 feet for the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal now, but they will come here again soon for 25 feet, as they always do in every one of these cases, and that means $12,000,000 more for a 13-mile canal. That is the reason why in every case like this we ought to have a contribution from the private interests that are to be benefited. We ought to have a contribution on this Curtis Bay proposition. The Government has already dredged the bay to the depth of 30 feet, and we ought to compel private interests demanding the improvement to pay their full share. That is the purpose I have at this time in offering this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin to strike out the paragraph.

The question was taken, and the motion was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Improving Herring Bay and Rockhole Creek, Fairhaven, Md.: Completing improvement in accordance with the reports submitted in House Document No. 161, Sixty-third Congress, first session, as modified in Rivers and Harbors Committee Document No. 11, Sixty-third Congress, second session, and subject to the conditions set forth in said committee document, $11,800.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The objection that I am trying to get the House to understand is the beginning of this intercoastal canal paralleling the ocean from Boston, Mass., to the Rio Grande in the face of the fact that the canal business has gone out of date—that it can not compete with the railroads of the country. And yet it is not a question of competing with the railroads. Of course, the railroad transportation is higher than ocean transportation, but here is a proposition to dig a canal to compete with ocean-going freight steamers, the cheapest and only cheap mode of transportation in the world.

Mr. Chairman, the ocean-going steamers from Valparaiso to Birmingham, England, carry iron ore for £1 per ton, or less than one-half a mill per ton-mile. That is the cheapest freight in the world. Those freights can be carried on the ocean, where it is carried in a single vessel that carries from 2,000 tons upward, drawing from 20 to 40 feet of water, that has its own propeller, cheaper than it can be carried in any other way on earth.

Here is a proposition to dig a canal that can not compete with railroads. It has been shown that it can not compete with the railroads, but they are going to compete with the ocean-going steamers all the way from Boston around to the Gulf of Mexico. I have said that the Erie Canal, which goes through the greatest freight-carrying territory in the world, from the Great Lakes to the Atlantic Ocean, freight that creates a demand for freight-carrying devices, and they have had a 7-foot canal there for 100 years. This canal at one time had an immense freightage, but it has gone out of business, practically, because it could not compete with the railroads that go through the same territory. It is so completely out of business that New York, seeking to improve it, to recover the commerce on it, has voted $150,000,000——

Mr. GOULDEN. One hundred and thirty million dollars.

Mr. CALLAWAY (continuing). To make the 7-foot canal into a 12-foot canal, although it is in the face of the actual fact that Canada has abandoned the Welland Canal, 14 feet deep, connecting two great bodies of water, because it could not compete with the railroads, on account of the merchandise having to be unloaded and reloaded again into ocean vessels.

That is the condition of the Welland Canal, which is 14 feet deep. They are now contemplating digging a canal deep enough to carry Great Lakes steamers from one great lake to the other, because they find that is the only kind of canal that is of real value. Our canals in this country have been abandoned, as shown by the report of the Commissioner of Corporations. In this report which I hold in my hand it says that the table does not include abandoned canalized rivers. I tried to get that from the Commissioner of Corporations, but I could not get it; but this is the actual canal mileage abandoned in this country—2,444 miles, which have cost $81,171,374.

If you can carry canal freight in competition with the railways, why have these 2,444 miles of canal been abandoned? Mr. Chairman, further than that, going to the rivers, the Mississippi River is certainly one of the greatest rivers in the world. There is certainly no better freight-carrying river on earth than the Mississippi. We have been spending money on it from the time this Government began, and yet that river is going out of the freight-carrying business. The Ohio River is a great freight-carrying river—one of the greatest in the country—and yet that river is going out of the freight-carrying business, while the commerce throughout that country has continued to increase, and is now twenty times as great as it was in 1898. I want to read you the figures showing the difference between what the freight actually costs on these rivers now and what it cost in 1898. On the upper Mississippi in 1889——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. I object.

Mr. DONOVAN. Then, Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present. If the gentleman can not allow the gentleman from Texas to continue for five minutes, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I have no disposition in the world to filibuster on this bill.

Mr. DONOVAN. Oh, let him have five minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. DONOVAN. Then, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. McCoy). The gentleman from Connecticut makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and three Members present, a quorum.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to refute what the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY] has just said with respect to the practicability of hauling freight on barges. I happen to own a lot of barges in my own business, and these barges run for a distance of 40 miles, from one terminal to another, and at the same time we have a lot of railroad cars that we haul over the railroads. We can make the round trip of 40 miles in a single day with a barge, and it takes five days to make the round trip with a railroad train. We can haul the material on the barges for two-fifths of what we pay on the railroads, and I submit that if you can haul material of any kind by water for two-fifths of what it costs by rail, it is a good investment for the Government of the United States to encourage transportation by water. The one thing in favor of this barge proposition is that, although the barges run at a slower rate per hour than do the railroad trains, they will make the trip from end to end without interruption, and the barges will be at the disposal of the person requiring the commodity at a fixed hour on a given day, whereas with the movement of trains and the switching in the great business centers of the country, nobody ever knows when he is going to get the car on which his commodity is being carried. I am speaking from practical experience, and not from information that has no basis in fact.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. CALLAWAY. The very fact that the barge has no interruption from end to end shows that it is not a freight carrier—that it does not accommodate the public.

Mr. MADDEN. It certainly is a freight carrier, and it does accommodate the public, and it is carrying the commodity for less money than it can be carried by rail. And, strange as it may seem, although it may run only 5 or 6 miles an hour, it will make a given distance in less time than the railroad trains will make it. You can own all of the cars you please, and furnish them to the railroad companies to transport your own commodities, and between the time that you get them for loading and the time they are delivered back to you to unload, you will have discovered that you have the use of your car for only one day out of five.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. The reason why the railroad companies are obliged to charge more for freight is because of the great amount of switching that has to be done at the different terminals. The reason why there is so much delay in the delivery of goods by rail is that switching has to be done here, there, and everywhere, and there is no certainty as to when the goods will be delivered after they start. Everybody who has business to do with the railroads knows that no one can deny that fact; and if anybody has practical information of what the business of transportation is, he must conclude that you can transport by water for less than two-fifths of what you can transport by rail. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. SMALL. I call the gentleman's attention to the further fact that the Interstate Commerce Commission has reported that the average distance traveled by freight trains per day of 24 hours is only 25 miles.

Mr. MADDEN. That is the average; and the ordinary canal boat can make 50 miles a day without any difficulty whatever, and does make it.

Mr. MURDOCK. Does the gentleman say that a canal boat will make more mileage per day than a freight car?

Mr. MADDEN. I say a canal boat will run a given distance from point to point five times more quickly, on the average, than a freight train will.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Because it has no interruption?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. Is not that also true of the stagecoach? Why not go back to the days of the stagecoach?

Mr. MADDEN. I am not talking about stagecoaches. That day has gone by, and the day of transportation by water has not only not gone by, but it is yet to come, and this question of railroad facilities all over the United States must be supplemented by water transportation if we are going to keep down excessive freight rates. It may be that some of these waterways do not carry any freight. But if there is a waterway, though it may not be in use, for 50 miles on each side of that waterway every railroad that parallels it will carry freight for 20 per cent less than it would if there was no waterway.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois may speak for five minutes longer. This is very illuminating.

Mr. MADDEN. I could not do that in the face of my own objection.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I desire not to discuss but to read directly from the report. Will the gentleman permit me to do that before he closes debate? I only desire about three minutes.

Mr. SPARKMAN. In eight minutes, then.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent that all debate upon the paragraph and all amendments thereto close in eight minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry the gentleman from Illinois would not accept more time, because his talk has been very illuminating and has materially helped the committee, I am sure. Now, I desire to address my remarks for a moment or two to the gentleman from Texas. The gentleman from Texas has no qualms of judgment about the advisability of having barge traffic. He seems to think we ought to have only ocean-going steamers, which monopolize water-carrying business, and the railroads, which tend to monopolize the carrying business upon the land. I do not believe that is the position of the gentleman from Texas, but he argues that way. Now, he does not know or he has not considered that oil has come to be a great factor in transportation; that instead of loading up vessels with coal—or locomotives for that matter—that thousands of boats, even hundreds of thousands—I believe 300,000 are in this country to-day—operate by motive power generated from gasoline. These boats are entering upon the inland waterways of the country and are going into fertile fields of endeavor that have not been utilized heretofore. They are doing a carrying trade from the farm to the market. They are going into the bayous, into the small creeks and little rivers. They are bringing the markets to the point of distribution and they are feeding the railroads and the ocean-carrying vessels. Now, the gentleman from Texas wants to know whether the barge business is worth while. Along the Atlantic seaboard the barge business is supplanting the sailing craft. The sailing craft is going out of business. It does not pay to operate—the cost of insurance, the inability to obtain needed competent seamen, all enter into this question. The barge, put upon a standard waterway, would move as expeditiously in carrying heavy freight as does a railroad train, and would satisfy the trade quite as well as the railroads, for it would be cheaper. It does that now. Take the traffic between points like Trenton and New York. There you have a barge line running between those two cities carrying large quantities of tonnage upon 7 feet of water. This is what they have in Germany and in France, only the business upon the Delaware & Raritan Canal is limited. Take the line of barges doing business between the Delaware River and the Chesapeake Bay and to points in Virginia and in the Carolinas. They carry heavy freight it does not always pay to carry on railroads.

Mr. GOULDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE. I will.

Mr. GOULDEN. I desire to state to the gentleman, in line with his argument, that that is the purpose of improving and keeping the Erie Canal open to this class of barges intending to make a speed of 10 miles an hour.

Mr. MOORE. Of course it is.

Mr. GOULDEN. That these boats shall have a motive power that will enable them to make the trip in two days of 440 miles between Buffalo and New York, at an estimated saving of $27,000,000 a year over railroad freights, on a basis of 10,000,000 tons yearly.

Mr. MOORE. And the gentleman from New York, I have no doubt, will bear out this statement, that the people of New York are justified in rebuilding the Erie Canal, at a cost of reconstruction at upward of $100,000,000 for the purpose of attaining a draft of 12 feet, so that it will pay to put 1,000 and 2,000 ton barges to work in the carrying business from the Great Lakes down the Hudson.

Mr. GOULDEN. Three-thousand-ton barges, I would suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE. I want to say to the gentleman that it ought to be patent to the gentleman from Texas that a barge capable of carrying 2,000 tons of fright——

Mr. GOULDEN. Three thousand.

Mr. MOORE. I am taking a 2,000-ton barge, which would have a 12-foot draft, for illustration. That barge would carry as much freight as a train of 40 cars, which would require 2 engines. Now, there is a tremendous saving. The gentleman from Connecticut, in a facetious moment a little while ago, one of those facetious moments which occasionally strike through his spasm of gloom, directed some inquiry as to freight charges. I did say, and I say again, that the ocean carrying tonnage costs in mills. The cost by rail——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MOORE. I can not tell it all, then. I am sorry. I will wait until the next time.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I have three minutes, I believe.

New York did not ask any aid from this Government when it appropriated $110,000,000 for the Erie Canal, Boston did not ask any aid from the Government when it contributed $9,000,000 toward its harbor project, but Baltimore, whether it gets a 12-foot or a 35-foot channel from the Government for its canal, refuses to contribute one dollar.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. I have but three minutes; I can not yield. I am directing your attention now to this proposition of equal contributions by benefited localities.

Mr. TREADWAY. I was going to call his attention to Boston.

Mr. FREAR. I have to hurry up, and I want to ask the chairman of the committee a question before I get through. I read from the report, on page 2, the following:

Rockhole Creek empties into Herring Bay, which is situated on the westerly side of Chesapeake Bay, about 20 miles by water below Annapolis, Md. There is now a controlling depth of 3 feet in Rockhole Creek from the mouth to the bridge, a distance of 1 mile. The district officer reports that the creek is used by 40 to 50 sailing vessels of from 10 to 30 tons, and also by more than 100 gasoline boats of from 3 to 5 tons capacity used in oystering.

Further down on the page it says:

The board believes that this is a case in which local interests would receive special benefits, and that the locality should share in the first cost of the work if the United States is to bear the subsequent expense of maintenance. The board therefore recommends the improvement proposed by the district officer, at a total estimated cost of $12,280 and not to exceed $500 per annum for maintenance, provided that before any work is undertaken by the United States—

Notice how safely the committee has hedged the interests of the United States in this insignificant case—local interests shall contribute one-half the estimated first cost of the work, or $6,140.

That poor little oyster village up there has got to contribute one-half toward the project, but Baltimore and every other influential community gets a free gift.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I want to say to the gentleman that there is a later report on that.

Mr. FREAR. I was going to ask that question.

Mr. SPARKMAN. The gentleman does not seem to want information.

Mr. FREAR. I am going to ask you a question in a moment. Reading further down, it says:

In general, the methods described in the report of the district officer, at an estimated cost of $12,280 for first construction and not to exceed $500 annually for maintenance, provided that one-half the estimated first cost of the improvement be contributed by local interests before any work is undertaken by the United States. The full share of the expense to be borne by the United States, $6,140, should be provided in one appropriation.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I would tell the gentleman, if he would give me time——

Mr. FREAR. Let the gentleman take his own time, because I have only three minutes.

This bill provides $11,800, but you only propose in the report to contribute $6,000, which is about one-half of the amount.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Does the gentleman want information?

Mr. FREAR. Yes. I shall be glad to have an answer right there, please.

Mr. SPARKMAN. There is a later report on that.

Mr. FREAR. What is the amount? I do not care about the report.

Mr. SPARKMAN. The conditions are changed.

Mr. FREAR. What is the change in conditions?

Mr. SPARKMAN. It is simply provided that the localities there shall put up a wharf.

Mr. FREAR. Why should not the localities there contribute as the citizens elsewhere do? You are following the report of the engineer, according to repeated statements from the committee, and here it is. Why not follow it in this case?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving harbors at Rockhall, Queenstown, Claiborne, and Cambridge, and Chester, Choptank, Warwick, Wicomico, Pocomoke, La Trappe, and Manokin Rivers, and Tyaskin Creek, Md.: For maintenance, $30,500.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. In answer to the contention of the gentleman from Illinois that if this shallow-water craft is a much cheaper mode of freight than railways, I want to ask why is it, if it is a so much cheaper mode of transportation than carrying by rail, that that character of freight has gone out of business? Here is the report of these engineers, these scientific men. On the upper Mississippi River in 1889 they carried 3,947,364 tons of freight. In 1906 they carried 593,885 tons of freight, a loss of 85 per cent of the actual tonnage on the river, and that despite the fact that from 1889 to 1906 the freight to be carried through that country had increased 20 times.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. CALLAWAY. No; I will not. I will not yield now.

Mr. Chairman, on the Illinois River——

Mr. SPARKMAN. If the gentleman does not want information, all right.

Mr. CALLAWAY. I have information here from these scientific men.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Florida?

Mr. SPARKMAN. The tonnage has increased enormously over the figures the gentleman has mentioned.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, the Illinois River in 1889 carried 189,264 tons of freight. In 1906, notwithstanding the enormous increase of freight through that territory to be carried, that river carried only 105,826 tons of freight, or a decrease of 41 per cent of freight actually carried. Why is it that they can not carry freight if the water craft that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] talks about can carry it so much cheaper, two-thirds of what the railroads can carry it at?

The river and its tributaries above St. Louis in 1889 carried 3,823,100 tons of freight; in 1906 it carried 1,066,390 tons of freight, a loss of 50 per cent.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. What river is that?

Mr. CALLAWAY. The Missouri River and its tributaries.

The Ohio River and the lower Mississippi River, both taken together, in 1889 carried 28,289,503 tons of freight; in 1906, 19,531,093 tons of freight, or a loss of 51 per cent. And yet they have the unmitigated nerve, in the face of this showing, in the face of the showing that more than half the canals that have been built in this country have been abandoned—they have the nerve, the unmitigated gall, to come in here and claim to this House that that kind of freight can compete with the railroad.

Mr. Chairman, one of the reasons it can not is the insurance rate; another reason is the smashing up of these barges; another reason is the drayage at the ports where they unload; another reason is that these freight-carrying streams or canals do not go where they want the freight carried to, and the railroads do go there.

They talk about going from point to point without interruption. The gentleman told the truth when he said there was no interruption, because when a barge goes through one of these canals it goes all the way through without stopping. It does not have stopping places like a railroad has. It does not have stopping places along the way, as the railroad does. You might send through freights over the railroads in the same way. In my country, in the spring of the year, when we load out our cattle for Chicago and the eastern markets, the railroad tracks are cleared, and the freight train loaded with cattle for Chicago goes through the towns without a check. A barge can not compete with that. A local freight that picks up a bag of onions here and a lot of chickens there is a wholly different proposition from that. The gentleman is not comparing one local freight with another local freight. His barge on the canal makes only 3 miles an hour, but the railroad train goes 20 miles an hour. The railroad in that respect is like the barge traffic, it goes on because it has nothing to do from one terminal to another but go through.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I rise for the purpose of opposing the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY].

I have watched the debate on this bill for the last two days, and for a purpose. There is quite a decided and insistent rumor about the building that there is a filibuster on here. I do not believe there is. The items in the bill have been opposed—that is, most of the items—and opposed consistently and with much illumination by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] and by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY]. As to text, this is the most difficult appropriation bill which comes before the House. Nearly every item in it has a reference to some certain House document. If a man wants to know about an item in this bill he must go to that House document. The Member here will ordinarily not do any such thing. The gentleman from Wisconsin and the gentleman from Texas have done this laborious reference work, and in the debate on this measure they are giving to the river and harbor bill more illumination than I have ever seen given to similar bills before.

I took pains this afternoon to make a comparison to determine whether or not the river and harbor bill was taking up more than its proportion of time in the House. I went back a year in the RECORD and tabulated the time we had given on each of the major measures here for general debate. I found that in the year we had devoted to general debate 157 hours. It may interest the House to know that that is 32 legislative days of unremitting talk—and that is some talk, by the way. [Laughter.]

We gave to the tariff bill 50 hours of general debate; that is, exclusive of the five-minute rule discussion. We gave to the currency bill, 41 hours; to the District of Columbia bill, 6 hours' general debate; to the Post Office appropriation bill, 19 hours; to the fortifications bill, 4 hours; to the Indian appropriation bill, 8 hours; to the urgent deficiency bill, 2½ hours; to the Army bill, 6 hours; to the Agricultural bill, 12 hours; and to this bill, 9¼ hours—that is, on general debate. I will here insert the table I have prepared.

	Hours.
Apr. 23, 1913. Tariff bill	50
Sept. 10, 1913. Currency bill	41
Dec. 16, 1913. District of Columbia	6
Jan. 15, 1914. Post Office appropriation bill	19
Jan. 29, 1914. Fortifications	4
Feb. 10, 1914. Indian	8
Feb. 20, 1914. Urgent deficiency	2½
Feb. 26, 1914. Army	6
Mar. 3, 1914. Agricultural	12
Mar. 17, 1914. Rivers and harbors	9¼
Total hours consumed in general debate	157¾

This bill has had no particular preference, so far as general debate is concerned, over several other bills. The charge that this is a filibuster comes about through the fact that we are soon to have before us the canal-tolls repeal, and its proponents are impatient to take it up. We are to be gagged and bound here with a rule which, I understand, is to give us only 15 hours' general debate. We would not be gagged and bound if gentlemen on both sides of this aisle would refuse to accept this 15 hours' debate and vote down the rule and give to us on probably the greatest proposition that has come up in my day in Congress opportunity for full discussion.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MURDOCK. And I think if the House could have that assurance, it might expedite this matter, although there has been up to date absolutely no attempt, so far as I can see, to filibuster.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kansas yield to the gentlemen from Georgia?

Mr. MURDOCK. Yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. How much time does the gentleman think we ought to have for the discussion of the canal-tolls question?

Mr. MURDOCK. Oh, I have had more demands made upon me for time on that question than for any other measure since I have been here. I should say 40 hours of general debate should be given.

Mr. HARDWICK. Does the gentleman think 40 hours' debate would change a single vote?

Mr. MURDOCK. Well, the way votes have been changing our way in the last few days inclines me to think it would. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARDWICK. Does the gentleman think the debate has had anything to do with it?

Mr. MURDOCK. The people of the country are at last understanding just exactly what the treaty means, and they are reading it America's way and not England's way, and I think the votes are changing on that account. [Applause.]

However, I want to say to the gentleman from Georgia that I for one am anxious to get into the canal-tolls proposition; but when it does come in I should like to see the Members of this House on both sides of the aisle assert their rights, take full time for discussion, and open up the bill to amendment.

Mr. HARDWICK. That is the very point. Now, one other question. If the issue is whether we shall repeal or not repeal this particular provision, what necessity is there for amendment?

Mr. MURDOCK. There are very pertinent amendments that might be offered.

Mr. HARDWICK. What amendments? Can the gentleman state?

Mr. MURDOCK. I can; and if the gentleman will give me the chance I or some one on this side of the aisle will offer an amendment.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the gentleman tell us what it is?

Mr. MURDOCK. I have in mind a very pertinent amendment. I will tell the gentleman at the proper time.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman from Kansas will yield, there are two sections in the repeal bill which are entirely dissimilar.

Mr. MURDOCK. I have in mind one amendment in particular.

Mr. MANN. When I say there are two sections which are entirely dissimilar the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] shakes his head. That shows that he is not familiar with the bill.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman from Kansas thinks it will take a long time to defend the subsidy, does he not?

Mr. MURDOCK. I do not concede that it is a subsidy——

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, a point of order against this discussion.

Mr. MURDOCK. I should like two minutes more. I have not taken up any time in this debate.

Mr. SPARKMAN. If you want to discuss this bill or any provision of it, I am willing to give the gentleman time.

Mr. MURDOCK. I will ask the gentleman to give me one minute more.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I will give the gentleman two or three minutes on the bill.

Mr. MURDOCK. No; one minute along this line. I want to answer the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS]. I ask for one minute more.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I will give the gentleman two minutes, as far as I am concerned.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the time of the gentleman be extended two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MURDOCK. It was the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] who brought up this discussion in the first place, and alleged here, during the debate on last Saturday, that the discussion of this bill was being abused by the House in the way of a filibuster by Members in not confining the discussion to the bill itself. I took occasion this morning, while I was looking through the dry-as-dust CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, to spot some of the remarks of the gentleman from Tennessee; and I find that on January 16 last the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] injected himself into the midst of a general debate on the Post Office bill, and that he began his remarks on that occasion with this statement:

> Mr. Chairman, in order to relieve the Members of the House, I promise not to refer to anything in this bill.

[Laughter.]

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with delight——

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto be closed in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with a good deal of pleasure to my distinguished friend from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK]. The explanation of the attitude of the gentlemen on the other side of the House is plain. If the gentleman from Kansas had had the privilege of looking at the afternoon papers, he would have found out that the President, if correctly quoted, has said that a filibuster was being carried on in the House in order to prevent the passage of the bill repealing the Panama Canal tolls act. It seems that the President is still laboring under the impression that he is dealing with a lot of schoolboys, and from the actions on that side of the House that impression is well founded. A little while ago we had an illustration, when one of the gentlemen on that side of the House was so anxious to follow the desire of the President to put through the bill to surrender to England and the transcontinental railroads that he could not wait for a single question to be asked on this side of the House, although an item involving some $6,000,000 was then under consideration. It has come to the point where it seems impossible for us to do anything in this House without instructions first coming from the other end of the Avenue. A day or two ago it was generally understood that instructions were circulated through the House that we must have only 15 hours' debate on the proposition to repeal the present Panama Canal law. In a few minutes after this information reached us the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] was here on the floor making a complaint about a filibuster.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes; for a question.

Mr. SHERLEY. I simply want to make this statement: My name was connected with the statement that the President had through me requested that there should be but 15 hours' debate on the canal-tolls bill. I want to say that there was not a scintilla of truth in that report.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I never heard that it came through the gentleman. That report was circulated through the House, but the gentleman's name was not connected with it.

Mr. SHERLEY. The newspapers so quoted it, and it was so stated on the floor of the Senate; hence my statement this morning.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I am not questioning whether the President asked the gentleman to make that statement. I am not going to ask the gentleman whether he discussed it with the President or not. I know if he did, he would treat it confidentially, as it ought to be treated.

Mr. SHERLEY. I will say to the gentleman that I have had several talks with the President, and there has never been any intimation by him that he wished me to do anything touching the procedure of this House.

Mr. MANN. The statement has been made by a very distinguished Member of this House that the President asked him to oppose more than 15 hours' debate, and I have no doubt of the truth of the statement.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. In view of the statement that the gentleman from Illinois has just made, we might just as well have an understanding. That statement has come direct to Members of this House from gentlemen who said it was made by the President. Now I want to know whether there is any truth in the statement contained in the edition of the Washington Times of to-day, which I hold in my hand, in which it says that this charge of filibustering by the President is expected to bring this river and harbor bill to a vote not later than to-morrow afternoon? The article says the charge that there is a filibuster on to prevent prompt action on the canal tolls bill was made by the President. Does the gentleman know whether or not the President made that charge, and are the Members on that side of the House pressing this bill because they have had instructions from the White House? Are we to legislate according to the dictations that come from the White House? What does the President know about the bill under consideration? How much does he know about the amounts involved in it? How much does he know about the amount of debate that we ought to have?

Now, some of you gentlemen that know about it get up here and deny it if it is not true. Let us know the truth. If it is true that the President is trying to coerce this House so that he may hasten the day for voting on the canal-tolls proposition——

Mr. SPARKMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Wait until I get through.

Mr. SPARKMAN. If the gentleman will not yield to me I am going to object.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Does the gentleman want to ask me a question?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I am going to answer the gentleman. I want to say that I am pressing this matter because I want to get through with it, and not because the President has asked me to.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Does the gentleman from Florida think there is a filibuster?

Mr. SPARKMAN. No; I would not say that there is any filibuster; I would not charge that. And if there was, I would not think the gentleman from Washington would engage in a filibuster on this or any other bill.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I am the ranking Member on this side of the House. Up to this time I have occupied but five minutes. But the question I want answered is whether or not this House is to be coerced into limiting the discussion it shall give to a bill in order that the President may hasten the time when we can, in the interest of England and the transcontinental railroads, repeal the Panama Canal act.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I have no such object in view; my sole purpose is to get the bill through as early as practicable.

Mr. HARDWICK. Now will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I will.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the gentleman give us the name of the prominent Member of the House that he mentioned?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I will not.

Mr. HARDWICK. Does the gentleman think that he ought to make such a statement——

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The gentleman from Georgia knows something about the courtesies of this House.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes; but does the gentleman from Washington think he ought to make a statement of that kind without telling us who his authority is?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The gentleman from Georgia can pass his opinion on my acts. I am willing that my acts shall be judged of by the House, and the gentleman from Georgia can put his own construction on them.

Mr. HARDWICK. That is the usual way when gentlemen make statements of that kind.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on this paragraph is closed. Is there objection to the withdrawal of the pro forma amendment?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Breton Bay, Md.: Completing improvement in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 127, Sixty-third Congress, first session, and subject to the conditions set forth in said document, $3,000.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to say, with reference to the charge that there is a filibuster here against this bill in order to delay the vote on the canal-toll bill, that I voted right on that proposition on the 23d of May, 1912.

Mr. MURDOCK. How did the gentleman vote?

Mr. CALLAWAY. When the question comes up again, I am going to vote as I did then—against the exemption of coastwise shipping. [Applause.] I am not making any filibuster on the bill to defer that vote. I want to get into the minds of the membership of this House what an outrage is being perpetrated on the Federal Treasury and the American people and the country as a whole by attempting to dig an intercoastal canal from Boston to the Rio Grande River.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALLAWAY. No; not at this time. Here is a report of the Commissioner of Corporations on the question of the abandonment of canals:

Among the causes for the abandonment of canals have been the original improvident location of some canals, mismanagement, the adverse control of strategic connections and terminals, and, above all, the inability of shallow canals to adapt their physical conditions to the demands of modern transportation. Practically all the canals now in most successful use are ship canals forming comparatively short links between important natural waterways and opening up extended routes of transportation by water for large vessels. Such short-link ship canals are to be clearly distinguished from long inland canals, and the success of the one offers no safe criterion as to the probable success of the other.

Mr. Chairman, these ship canals are such canals as the Welland Canal, 26 miles long, which connects the St. Lawrence River with Lake Erie, and such canals as the Soo Canal, 1¾ miles long, which connects the Great Lakes. I want to say here, and it may be information to the House, that the Soo Canal, which is a real ship canal, as all vessels of the Great Lakes pass back and forth, that if you took the actual cost of digging the canal, the actual cost of the upkeep of it, the cost of transporting the freight through it, as a canal pure and simple it could not compete with the railroad transportation. That canal carries ten times more freight than any other canal on earth, and yet that canal taken as such, calculating the freight per ton-mile carried through it, will not pay the cost of upkeep, operation, and interest on the original investment. Of course it is a great means of commerce, because it connects great bodies of water. It is like the Panama Canal. No man would claim that purely as a canal proposition that the Panama Canal would ever pay. It would be an unqualified failure. But when you connect great oceans and the freight passes through it, with the Atlantic on one side, where great vessels can go in straight lines thousands of miles to their destination, and with the Pacific on the other side the same way, it is a great commercial avenue; but purely as a canal no one could claim that it could compete with the railroads.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph. I am sorry the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] has stepped out. Saturday he remarked that this was a filibuster. Glancing through the bill I wondered why the suggestion came from him, and I found that for the State of Tennessee there is a charge of $4,500,000 for the improvements of rivers in that State. I do not believe that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] had that in mind. I do not think he thought of it at all, because I am going to do him the credit of saying that I believe he was honest when he thought that this was a filibuster. But this is not a filibuster so far as I am concerned. I want to say this, as one who is responsible for these interrogations of the committee, that the leader of the minority has asked me to "let up," as he expressed it, believing I had made my points clear; but there is no desire on my part, Mr. Chairman, to trespass on the time of the House or to be in any way unfair. Here is a bill appropriating $43,000,000. Over $1,000,000 of that great amount is contributed by my own State. I made the statement on Saturday that many of these items appear to me to be unjustified, and on the strength of that I was invited by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS] to show what they are, and I have given you a dozen in all or more. I read now from the Breton Bay report, on page 6:

A public hearing was held at Leonardtown on September 12, 1912, to afford an opportunity to interested parties to express their views and to ascertain the improvement desired. * * *

And the report continues:

In view of what preceded, any extension of the present project for Breton Bay, Md., is not deemed worthy of being undertaken by the United States at the present time.

Who would expect a delegation in a village to oppose a proposition that the Government should give them money? Is it not absurd that an engineer would put in such a statement?

I read further now from page 7 of the report:

It was claimed at the hearing that the private wharf was getting so out of repair as to be unsafe, and that the owners thereof refused to place it in safe condition. As the extension now desired appears to be much less than that previously asked for, and upon construction of the public wharf will be needed to meet actual necessity of commerce, the board recommends that a survey be authorized to determine the cost and advisability of the improvement.

I do not know whether there is any more to this report or not, but here is a report that it is not desirable for the Government to incur any expense whatever; and yet we have in the bill an appropriation of $3,000. It is small, I concede. It seems to me that we ought to be enlightened more in respect to these matters, because every one of these 500 or more items is a proposition to take money out of the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. GARNER. Does the gentleman mean to say that the final report of the Chief of Engineers was adverse to this proposition?

Mr. FREAR. I do not know that the final report was, but here is a report of the engineer with the preliminary examination of the district engineer, who is a man that knows the facts.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman does not contend that the report of the local engineer should control finally, but the Board of Engineers and the Chief of Engineers should control.

Mr. FREAR. I will say this, that I have other cases here in which the Chief of Engineers overrules the district engineer, because here is his statement, that in view of his judgment and experience it is well to have this appropriation made. It is also stated in some cases that Congressmen exercise their interest and influence in explaining such advantages to the Chief of Engineers.

Mr. GARNER. But on the other hand, is it not a fact, and is it not more universally so, that the local engineer makes a favorable report and the Board of Enginers and the Chief of Engineers overrules that report?

Mr. FREAR. Of course that would not come before the House, so I have no information upon that.

Mr. GARNER. Oh, yes; these reports are all made, adverse as well as favorable.

Mr. FREAR. But the gentleman knows that if the Chief of Engineers reports unfavorably it would not appear here, but he does overrule the report frequently, as in this case, without explanation therefor. That is all I have to say. I move to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I can not just understand the force of the gentleman's criticism of this particular paragraph, but no doubt the fault is with me; nor do I question the gentleman's good faith, for I know he is entirely sincere, but I do wish to say that if he had taken time since this bill was introduced in the House, something like four weeks ago, and had studied the reports he would not have taken the position he is now assuming upon many of the propositions involved. Now, this is a proposition which, I think, should commend itself to the House. The amount is only $3,000, and the purpose is to give 10 feet of water where there are now about 8 feet, and to accommodate 14,000 tons of commerce. There is nothing objectionable about the proposition, and certainly if we are to take care of the commerce of this country along the coast, on the Atlantic, on the Gulf, on the Pacific, and on the Great Lakes, as I think the gentleman will agree should be done, we must make appropriations. The hundreds of other items in this bill are sound propositions and should, I think, receive the support of this House.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, is not all of that commerce being undertaken at the present time? Is there a proposal here to increase the commerce by reason of this improvement? Nothing so appears in the report.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I read from the report:

The improvement of Breton Bay was authorized by Congress, river and harbor act of June 13, 1878, and to September 19, 1890, nine appropriations aggregating $37,500 had been made. This sum was expended in dredging a channel 150 feet in width to, and a turning basin 400 by 600 feet at, Leonardtown Wharf, the depth of both being 9 feet at mean low tide. The work of this project was completed in 1891. Congress, in river and harbor act of June 13, 1902, provided for a channel 10 feet deep and 200 feet wide, including a turning basin 400 feet wide by 600 feet long by 10 feet deep, at Leonardtown Wharf, all in accordance with estimates for the larger channel in report on survey, act of March 3, 1899.

The gentleman was evidently reading from a district officer's report, one of the subordinates to the chief. I will say that the chief has the right to overrule the district and division engineers, as also the board.

Mr. FREAR. I understand that.

Mr. SPARKMAN. The method of procedure has been stated here time and again. It starts with the district officer and goes up to the division engineer, then passes through the board, and then goes to the Chief of Engineers, whose findings are final. That is what was done here. I have not had time to look over the report here and do not recall whether there was any adverse finding by the subordinates. The chief's report is of more importance than the others. I do not say that we should not consult those of the subordinate officers, the district and the division engineers, because sometimes we get very important information from them. The gentleman has referred several times to our objection to criticism. I am not objecting to any criticism at all.

Mr. FREAR. No; the committee has not. It has been very kind.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I think legitimate criticism is proper on these bills, and the different items in the bill, and we ought to expect and welcome such.

Now, I did not object at the outset; but, Mr. Chairman, it can not be true that every item in this bill is bad——

Mr. FREAR. I did not question the last one.

Mr. SPARKMAN. It can not be true that all are bad; some must be good.

Mr. FREAR. I did not question the last one.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I believe that is all I have to say.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a word or two in this particular case. The division engineer, the Board of Engineers, and Chief of Engineers all agree that the improvement is advisable, and the only one to disagree was the local engineer. I wondered if the gentleman from Wisconsin knew that?

Mr. FREAR. Yes; I read of the condition there.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. But failed to state it.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from Mississippi yield for a question?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I do.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Florida and the gentleman from Mississippi both took the floor to defend a $3,000 item about the retention of which in the bill there is no question whatever. I wonder if those gentlemen are conducting a filibuster to prevent the consideration of the tolls proposition?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I will answer the gentleman's question and state, and repeat what I stated yesterday to the gentleman from Wisconsin, that I believe it is the duty of every Member of this House who believes that there is any item in this bill that ought not to be there to make a motion to strike it out and present his reasons, and unless the committee can give reasons why the item should stay in the bill it ought not to be kept in the bill. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. I agree with the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion to strike out the paragraph.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Tred Avon River, Md.: Completing improvement of the North Fork of Tred Avon River in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 27, Sixty-third Congress, first session, and subject to the conditions set forth in said document, $19,600.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of presenting this report, but the suggestion occurred to me after I rose in regard to the question of filibustering. I have not discussed this matter with the other gentleman here who has been objecting, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY], and whatever I have said has been upon my own initiative and he has proceeded upon his own initiative. Now, I desire to read from page 5 of this report:

4. Easton, the county seat of Talbot County, Md., has a population within its corporate limits and immediately adjacent thereto of about 4,000 people. It has four banks with aggregate deposits of $2,125,000. The assessable value of property within the county is $13,000,000. The town is enterprising and is actively seeking to enlarge its water facilities. A committee of citizens, in response to an inquiry from this office, furnished a letter, appended hereto, under date of November 30, 1912, stating conditions at the locality. The Baltimore, Chesapeake & Atlantic Railway Co. operates a daily line of steamers between Easton and Baltimore throughout the year. These steamers handle a general commerce of over 5,000 tons a year, valued at more than $500,000, and carry about 9,000 passengers. The town is upon two railroads—the Baltimore, Chesapeake & Atlantic and the Philadelphia, Baltimore & Washington. Attention is invited to the statement in the letter of the committee, which was corroborated by information obtained upon the ground, that several industrial plants would have located upon the Tred Avon River above Easton Point had a proper depth of water existed in that part of the stream to enable them to transact their business. Some, even those financed entirely with Easton capital, have had to seek other localities, where the requisite depth existed, while others are still in abeyance and would probably locate at this town were the opportunities offered. It is believed also that the extension of the channel so as to afford a better water front and bring it nearer to the town will result in a decrease of freight rates.

Mr. Chairman, and yet those gentlemen living in Easton are not asked to contribute one dollar, but they are threatening, according to the engineer's report, to leave Easton and go elsewhere. On such a report as that an appropriation of $19,600 is made by the Government to a city that has $13,000,000 assessed valuation and banks with $4,000,000 on deposit. Just one moment more. I am not going to read all these reports before me. I say this in justification of the position I have taken at the invitation of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS]. I have many cases here of similar character to those I have read. And it seems to me they are almost identical on the question of contribution which should be made by the locality before any appropriation is made. I have no desire to trespass upon the time of the committee, but I shall occasionally refer to matters as they come up during the reading of the bill which I think ought to be explained.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I wish to call attention, before we proceed further, to the remarks which the gentleman from Wisconsin has reiterated with reference to the appropriation by the State of Massachusetts of $9,000,000 for Boston Harbor. He was extremely complimentary in referring to what the State has done, but I want to call his attention and the attention of the committee to the difference in the matter of the State appropriating money with these appropriations which are carried in the river and harbor bill for harbor improvements. The $9,000,000 appropriated by the State of Massachusetts are not to be used for deepening the channel. We are to build a dry dock there costing $3,000,000 and various other methods of accommodating commerce. The National Government has already appropriated for the 35-foot channel of Boston Harbor $12,187,947. As my colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. MURRAY] has already pointed out, we expect to ask for an increase in the depth of that channel from 35 to 40 feet. The same is true of the harbor of New York and is also true as to the State of New York, to which the gentleman from Wisconsin and the gentleman from Texas have both referred. The State of New York has appropriated money for deepening the Erie Canal, to be a part of the great system by which the Hudson River and the port of New York are the other part. The port of New York has been improved by the expenditures of many millions of dollars, and it is a right improvement, to deepen the channel into New York to a depth of 40 feet. This same sort of thing will continue, and Congress will be asked to appropriate money in connection with local money from the State or municipalities where they provide better facilities for commerce and the National Treasury provides the money for deepening the channel. I wish to draw attention to this fact, because, as I have already said, the gentleman from Wisconsin has used the appropriation by the State of Massachusetts very extensively in his remarks, and I thank him for the compliment he has extended to the State, but I wanted to show him the difference between the actual work done by the State and the work done by the Federal Government.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

I entirely agree with the statement that was made by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS] that these items ought to be challenged by anyone who honestly thinks that they are subject to challenge or criticism. I have not agreed, and I do not agree, with the criticisms that have been made on the various items of this bill. However, I think, Mr. Chairman, it is just as bad—in fact, a great deal worse—to discourage these criticisms than it is for Members to indulge in making them, even if they have an ulterior motive in so doing.

And in connection with that I want to ask the gentlemen on the other side especially what they think about this kind of a statement, which seems to be authorized, in the noon edition of to-day's paper, which states that the President, in a statement made this morning regarding this matter, directly challenges these Members who are making these criticisms with making them for the purpose of filibustering. In other words, that these criticisms are made not in good faith by these gentlemen who make them, but in bad faith, and for another reason and purpose than that of ascertaining the justness and correctness of items of this bill.

Mr. WILSON of Florida. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from Florida?

Mr. TOWNER. I can not, because I want to make just one other statement.

And further than that, Mr. Chairman, this statement goes much further than the mere allegation that these men are not acting in good faith. I ask gentlemen's attention to the significant language of this statement that is attributed to the President. It says that Democratic and Republican opponents of the administration are filibustering. In other words, every man who on your side of the House criticizes this bill is charged by the President as doing so for the purpose of not making the bill better, but for an ulterior purpose, and, more than that, by doing so places himself in antagonism to the administration. In other words, he says to all those on that side of the House, "Do not further criticize this bill, because if you do, you place yourselves in antagonism to the administration," and therefore every man in the Democratic Party that honestly desires to ascertain the correctness of any of these items runs counter to the charge by the President that by so doing he makes himself an enemy of the administration. The charge of filibustering is easy to make. Made on the floor of the House, it is not usually seriously regarded. But when the President in a statement given to the press charges that Members who are criticizing the items of an appropriation bill are not doing so in good faith, but to delay and defeat another bill in which he is particularly interested, and classes those who do so as enemies of his administration, the occurrence is worthy of consideration and should be resented. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Potomac River: For maintenance of improvement at Washington, D. C., $20,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. This is an item of considerable value to the city of Washington, and I would like to discuss it if I knew anything about it.

I just want to make this observation, which I hope may help expedite the passage of this bill. The President of the United States may frequently express a casual opinion in reference to procedure in Congress and may express impatience in reference to the rapidity with which bills are considered. And I know of no reason why he should not express an opinion of that sort. I have no doubt that, in reference to the toll proposition, from the information which has come to me, the President has expressed an opinion that 15 hours of debate was sufficient, and probably has expressed an opinion that the river and harbor bill was not proceeding as rapidly as he would like. And yet I would not for a moment, and do not, believe that the President desires to really interfere with the methods of procedure in the House of Representatives.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Why has he done it? Why does he make such statements?

Mr. MANN. Some gentleman asks why he has done it. You hear Members of the House—and I have frequently heard the gentleman who made the interruption—complain about the methods and length of debate in the Senate, which was none of his business, so far as the parliamentary point of view was concerned; and we frequently express opinions of that sort, sometimes in the hope that they will aid, but not for the purpose of overstepping the prerogatives of the one as compared with the prerogatives of the other.

Now, I have no doubt whatever that, notwithstanding that casual opinion expressed by the President, we will have considerably more than 15 hours of debate on the toll bill by practically common consent of both sides of the House. It is true that when the first proposition came up as to the length of debate on that bill, it was suggested that two days would be sufficient. I know one or two gentlemen came to me about it. I said that I thought it would require at least three days. I think possibly it was that suggestion which caused the original understanding for 15 hours' debate. With the further development, it became desirable to have more time. That was learned after the Committee on Rules had agreed to report a rule for 15 hours of debate. I have no doubt whatever that we will have more time. I do not believe that the President in his position has any desire at all to interfere with the perogatives of the House, though doubtless, like many gentlemen outside of the House, he may at times become impatient of delay over this subject or that subject. But his impatience will never be greater than the impatience frequently expressed by many Members of the House in private, if not in public.

Now, let me say this: We have been in session to-day for nearly three hours. We have read less than 2 pages of a bill 66 pages long. It is impossible in the transaction of the public business of this House on the average to take more than an hour to a page of an appropriation bill. So far as I know the average items in this bill are not so very much different, except possibly the first one, than the average items in an appropriation bill. It is proper to have the suggestions made by several of the gentlemen, and desirable in my opinion, to have some criticisms leveled against items in the bill. But it is not possible to make up the river and harbor bill in the House while it is under consideration in the House. These items have been before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors for months and months, receiving their careful consideration. We of the House must take in the main most of these items on faith. And I hope that the gentlemen who have been opposing some of the items in the bill will content themselves with opposing some of those items which they consider the most important to oppose, and not endeavor to oppose all of the items, because if that should be the case there is only one answer to it, and that is to pass the bill without reading it, and it will not be the first time it has been done. [Applause.]

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. MURDOCK. Has the gentleman any information or any intimation from any source that it is liable to be done in this case?

Mr. MANN. I have had no intimation of that whatever, not the slightest, but I have been long enough in the House to know that every House of Representatives desires to adjourn at some time and that it does not propose to spend all of its time on one bill, and within certain limits it must be able to proceed.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Illinois permit a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Out of the fullness of his information, which will be of help to many of us who have not had his experience, how does the progress of this bill compare with the progress of similar bills in former Congresses?

Mr. MANN. Well, I have seen this bill hurried through under suspension of the rules. I have seen it passed with 20 minutes' debate on a side, and I have seen it take as much time as it has taken now, up to date. I am not making any complaint about what has taken place up to this time.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I was simply asking for information.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Oyster Channel, Va.: Completing improvement in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 209, Sixty-third Congress, first session, and subject to the conditions set forth in said document, $11,250.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I wanted to make an inquiry of the chairman of the committee about Tangier Island, but I pass it over, in view of the admonition from the leader of the minority [Mr. MANN]. But I do want to ask a question in this case which I think is material. I will now read it. I have it marked. It seems to me to be an important question. Is not this one of the cases where you oblige the community to contribute one-half of the proposed expense? Let me read on page 2 of the report. Here is what the Chief of Engineers, William T. Rossell, says:

I report as follows: That the improvement by the United States of Oyster, Va., to provide a channel 100 feet wide and 6 feet deep, with a suitable anchorage for small boats, is deemed advisable so far as to secure an available channel depth of 6 feet and a channel width of 100 feet, increased at entrances and on curves, with an anchorage area as shown on accompanying map, at an estimated cost of $22,500 for first construction and $2,000 annually for maintenance, provided local interests contribute one-half of the cost of original work, $11,250, prior to commencement of operations by the United States. The share to be borne by the United States should be provided in one appropriation.

Is that right?

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is correct.

Mr. FREAR. Will the chairman of the committee explain what is the purpose of compelling this little place to contribute $11,250 toward the expense of this project and not compelling the people of other communities to contribute in other cases?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I will say to the gentleman, in reply to his question, that it was thought by the engineer that there were some special benefits accruing to the locality there that would not be shared by the general public.

Mr. FREAR. Is it not true that these benefits that have accrued in the case of many appropriations I have objected to have accrued to the local interests merely? I think the gentleman's answer is fair. In other words, is it not the policy of the House in a case like this to surrender its judgment to the Chief of Engineers when he says there should be a local contribution? Is it fair to the locality and fair to us to undertake to adopt that course of procedure?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I will say to the gentleman that the practice in the preparation of the last three or four river and harbor bills has been to follow pretty closely the recommendation of the engineers. The reason for that course is that the committee does not have the time or the opportunity to investigate these matters for itself and must take the opinion of somebody.

Mr. FREAR. That is satisfactory. If the gentleman will extend my time for me, I will yield to him further; but the gentleman next to me [Mr. MADDEN] objects to more than the five minutes being allowed. I realize that that is the reason, and it is unquestionably right that there should be a contribution here; but I can not understand why you permit the Chief of Engineers to determine your judgment as to any case in which a contribution is asked. You have not in this bill, so far as I can ascertain, in a single instance asked the local community to contribute unless the engineer so recommends, and you know the conditions as well as he does. You have not in a single case of your own motion asked any locality to make a contribution. It seems to me we ought not to leave this in the discretion of the engineer. If communities like Baltimore and other places get Government aid, they ought to be compelled to make contributions.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman insinuates here that in every case where a contribution from a community was demanded by the Chief of Engineers it was only a small community. Is that true?

Mr. FREAR. Yes; as I understand the policy.

Mr. MURDOCK. And the large communities escape?

Mr. FREAR. Yes; that is true. If the gentleman will pardon me, I will read from the committee report on another point. It says here on page 5 of the report that the new projects are $92,500,000, and that the present projects are $305,500,000. Now I want to ask this question, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. SPARKMAN. I think the gentleman has adopted a wrong predicate.

Mr. FREAR. Yes. I will correct that. There has been appropriated by this bill $34,016,395 for projects that are under way. That is right, is it not?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes.

Mr. FREAR. And there are proposed in this bill projects amounting to $38,684,700. Is not that true?

Mr. SPARKMAN. New projects taken on.

Mr. FREAR. New projects.

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is right; yes.

Mr. FREAR. That, according to the report as I read it, makes this Congress appropriate $72,000,000.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Oh, no.

Mr. FREAR. Pardon me. That makes $72,701,095, except that you are going to compel subsequent Congresses to complete the appropriations, but you are outlining them here. Is not that true?

Mr. SPARKMAN. The gentleman is mistaken. While we have adopted projects amounting to about $38,000,000, we have only appropriated about $5,000,000 or $6,000,000 for those projects in this bill.

Mr. FREAR. I understand——

Mr. SPARKMAN. And it will remain for future Congresses to determine whether these projects shall be completed. But I suppose they will do that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FREAR. I ask unanimous consent for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent for one minute more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FREAR. But, as I understand, this Congress has appropriated $34,000,000, and is placing an obligation upon future Congresses of $38,000,000, making $72,000,000. From that standpoint, is it not true, although you are only now appropriating $5,000,000 actually to carry on these future projects, this balance must be met and paid by the Government?

Mr. SPARKMAN. When the gentleman has consumed his one minute, I will answer that question.

Mr. FREAR. Very well. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has asked a question which I think ought to be answered. As I stated a moment ago, we have taken on new projects amounting to $38,000,000, and have appropriated for them about $5,000,000 in this bill. That is, the initial appropriation is about $5,000,000. It is for future Congresses to determine how far they will go. I assume they will go on until this work is completed. The amount carried in this bill does not reach $72,000,000. The $34,000,000 to which the gentleman referred a while ago is to be used in the prosecution of work on old projects and the maintenance of projects already completed. Perhaps the gentleman did not hear my remarks which I made the other day in the opening of the debate on this bill.

Mr. FREAR. The gentleman's speech has not been printed, I understand. I should be glad to read it.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I really have not had the time to do so. There are some tables that I wanted to prepare to go with my remarks, and I have not had time to get them up. I stated on the floor the other day, and will state again, that the entire amount of projects for which we are appropriating in this bill aggregates about $300,000,000. As I said, $150,000,000, or about half of the amount of those projects, is for the Mississippi and Missouri and the Ohio Rivers, including $13,000,000 for the East River in New York. The balance of it is spread all over the country, on the Atlantic, the Pacific, the Gulf, and the Lakes.

Mr. FREAR. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes.

Mr. FREAR. Does the gentleman believe that is a good policy to place this burden of $38,000,000 upon future Congresses, requiring them to appropriate for the completion of these new projects or else abandon them? That is, the judgment of this committee has placed that $38,000,000 upon future Congresses. Is it right for us to impose on future Congresses the burden of all that amount outside of the $5,000,000 which we appropriate in this bill?

Mr. SPARKMAN. If I had not thought so I would not have agreed to it.

Mr. FREAR. Suppose every Congress did that? Congress makes appropriations each year. Suppose each Congress proceeded to impose, in addition to the appropriation that is made, a burden of future obligations of $38,000,000 more than it took care of? What would be the result?

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is just what we have been doing from time immemorial. If the gentleman will go over the reports and records he will find that to be the case.

Mr. FREAR. You have $305,000,000 now.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Up to date we have spent about $711,000,000 on rivers and harbors, and for all governmental purposes since the beginning of this Government down to the present time we have spent about $21,000,000,000. Now, we can not do all the required work at once. We must leave something for other Congresses. We can not take on all projects and provide for their completion in one bill. The country would not tolerate it, and the gentleman from Wisconsin would be standing up here eloquent and forceful in condemnation of any such procedure.

Mr. FREAR. The engineer has asked for appropriations, and the committee have cut them in two. Is not the purpose of doing that to give more money to additional projects, and thus make an additional burden on the people?

Mr. SPARKMAN. We follow the engineers' report, as some people claim, too closely, but we do reserve something for ourselves. When we think the engineers recommend too large an appropriation we cut it down.

Mr. FREAR. That is as to these immediate appropriations?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Before we adopted the policy of annual bills a great many authorizations were made in each bill, sometimes more and sometimes less. In the bill of 1907 they footed up, authorizations and cash, to about $88,000,000.

Mr. FREAR. Did not that cover two years, making practically the same amount as covered by this bill here?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes. I do not remember now how much the authorizations were, but somewhere in the neighborhood of forty or fifty million dollars. Since we adopted the policy of annual bills we have not made as many authorizations as we had been accustomed to make heretofore. I am not sure but there ought to have been more in this bill. The Chief Engineer recommended $18,000,000 by way of authorizations, and we only put in about $4,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Florida has expired.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I would like three minutes more, because I wish to explain this matter a little further. I expected to do it later on, but I will do it now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to speak for three minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SPARKMAN. While we have only authorized in this bill $4,000,000, leaving about $14,000,000 that the engineers thought we should recommend by way of authorization, I want to say that I am under the impression—and I do not mind saying it to the House—that I have had in my mind the propriety of placing in the next bill quite a number of authorizations, a much larger number than we have placed in this bill. I think, inasmuch as we have $305,000,000 of projects on the books, we ought to begin to work some of them off. We ought to make authorizations for some of the more important and more urgent and complete them, or authorize the amounts to complete them, so that the Appropriations Committee can take care of them. The Delaware River is one; the Columbia River is perhaps another; also the Tennessee River.

Mr. FREAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes.

Mr. FREAR. Provided we made no new projects, it would take 8 years at the same rate we are appropriating money now to cover the projects already authorized.

Mr. SPARKMAN. About that.

Mr. FREAR. Does not the gentleman think we are burdening the future very rapidly, in view of the facts that have been demonstrated here during the consideration of this matter?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I thought that the position of the gentleman was that the longer time we took on these the better.

Mr. FREAR. Oh, no; the gentleman misunderstood me.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I think it would take longer than 8 years to complete these projects, for some of them, if the suggestions of the engineers are followed, will run over 27 years.

Mr. FREAR. That does not include the new appropriations. I say without appropriating a single dollar it would take eight years at $40,000,000 a year, and I ask the gentleman if that is not too great a burden to place on the Government—does that seem to be a good policy?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Oh, yes; I think so.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Locklies Creek, Va.: Completing improvement in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 612, Sixty-third Congress, second session, and subject to the conditions set forth in said document, $4,100.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. It will only take a moment to reply to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR]. If I understood the gentleman correctly, he said that local contributions were only required from small communities, or where the project was small.

Mr. FREAR. So far as my examination has gone, from the reports I have been able to read.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I want to call his attention to the fact that he is in error. The largest new project we take on in this bill, as I recall it, is the improvement of the Sacramento River. In that instance the local authorities will contribute about $5 to $1 for the United States.

Mr. FREAR. That is true. I read about that; but we have not reached that in the bill.

Mr. GARNER. Is it not a fact that in Texas we have $600,000 and an equal amount contributed by the locality at Port Arthur and Beaumont?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes; the Houston Canal. They require the authorities to pay half the amount.

Mr. GARNER. And the same at Beaumont.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes. In a Rhode Island project they require an appropriation or work to be done to the amount of $2,000,000. In the States of Oregon and Washington we are constantly contributing to the improvement of the Columbia River. At Seattle there is a canal on which the locks cost $2,275,000. The local authorities have been compelled to do the digging of the canal. We have contributed $3 for $1 expended by the Government. These are all very large projects.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes.

Mr. FREAR. I want to ask the gentleman if he does not deem this a good policy, to ask communities to contribute toward the project?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I will say to the gentleman that since I have been a member of the committee I have been in favor of it. I do not know but that the majority of the committee has also. I always believed that in a great many of these improvements the local authorities should contribute where, as in many instances, it is of particular value to the locality. Then there is an additional reason in the security it gives. If the local community is willing to contribute its own money, it is pretty fair evidence that the community at least believes the work is meritorious.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman takes his seat, how would he apply that policy to the Soo Canal, for instance? He would not ask the local people to pay for that?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. In view of the attitude that has been assumed by this administration, I think the Soo Canal should be maintained by the vessels that pass through the canal.

Mr. MANN. Oh, the gentleman does not think that himself?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I say, in view of the administration's attitude. I am very glad the gentleman called that to my attention, because I heard gentlemen from that section of the country the other day complaining because they said we were favoring special interests. The interests to be served by the Soo Canal are principally the Steel Trust and the Anthracite Coal Trust of Pennsylvania, and if there are any vessels in the world that ought to pay for the operation of a canal, it seems to me, those vessels belong to that class.

Mr. MOORE. Then we ought not to expect the people of Michigan to bear the expense of a national enterprise of that kind.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The people of Michigan generally, I think, do not agree with the position of the administration.

Mr. MOORE. I think the gentleman is right; but getting away from the diplomatic side of it, does the gentleman think it a good policy where a waterway is essential to the public welfare that the people in the immediate environment should be made to pay the expense of it?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I think that depends on the circumstances of each case. I can well understand how an improvement might be of benefit to the country at large, but at the same time it would be of especial benefit to a local community, and under such circumstances I think the people of that community ought to contribute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving inland waterway from Norfolk, Va., to Beaufort Inlet, N. C.: Continuing improvement, $800,000.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph. One year ago when this bill was before the House it carried an appropriation of $800,000 for this same project, an inland waterway from Norfolk, Va., to Beaufort Inlet, N. C. There had theretofore been appropriated for this same project $500,000. I moved to strike out the $800,000 item, because none of the $500,000 had been expended, and the title to the canal had not then been determined, and had the House sustained that motion we would have saved $1,300,000. If the House sustains this motion now, I do not know how much we will save, because I do not know how much has been expended. I do not know whether the Government has ever yet determined whether the title to that canal was good or not. Since that time I have been watching this great waterway from Norfolk, Va., to Beaufort, N. C. There is already a canal through there. I have noticed during the year that that canal—and I believe it is a 10-foot canal from Norfolk to Beaufort Inlet——

Mr. SMALL. Eight and a half feet.

Mr. CALLAWAY. It was originally 10 feet, was it not, and filled up some?

Mr. SMALL. Nine feet.

Mr. CALLAWAY. The gentleman from North Carolina tells me that it was originally a 9-foot canal, and it has filled in a little now and is about 8½ feet. There are two little gasoline boats running on that canal from Beaufort Inlet to Norfolk, Va., that draw 5 feet of water. One of them is John D. Rockefeller's oil boat, and the other carries the freight, and those little dinkies make one round trip a week each. They carry about as much freight as an ordinary box car, and that is the traffic now on this great waterway on which we have expended some $2,100,000 up to the present time. Oh, we are going to have great transportation on that route, if we can just get it made a 12-foot channel, when now they are not using more than 5 feet of the 8½ feet of water they have.

What is there at Beaufort Inlet? I looked to see what they had, and all last year there was not a real ocean-going steamer that stopped there. What is the commerce along that coast? If it wanted to go inland, it could not go on this intracoastal waterway; and if it wanted to go out to the water, it could not go on the intracoastal waterway. There can be no transportation on that canal 200 miles long unless it is moving up and down the coast, where they have not got anything.

Mr. STAFFORD. But is the gentleman not aware that the storms at this point on the ocean prevent their having any traffic at all? When this canal is dug will it not immediately create a large tonnage?

Mr. CALLAWAY. Oh, I am not aware of that, and neither is the gentleman. They have now an 8½-foot canal. The storms on the ocean do not bother that canal. Why do they not carry traffic on that if they have any traffic to carry? There used to be traffic on the Erie Canal when it was only 7 feet deep. It was carried to the satisfaction of the citizenship of New York. It was carried from the Great Lakes to the Atlantic Ocean on a 7-foot canal; and here is an 8-foot canal, and they can not carry anything on it, or do not carry anything on it, as through traffic. Of course, there are short hauls—little old things running here and there—joy-riding boats, and possibly they float some logs on it, and may carry a cargo of lumber once in a while, and brick. I understand at some places they have fertilizer factories, and at other places they carry soil and things of that kind; but the two little gasoline boats are the only regular through vessels. The only through boats that ply that canal regularly from Beaufort Inlet to Norfolk, Va., are these two little gasoline affairs which I have mentioned; one owned by John D. Rockefeller.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, if it were necessary to answer the contention of the gentleman based upon any facts which he adduced the necessity would not exist. His contribution to this discussion is only interesting as a work of fiction and as illustrative that he knows absolutely nothing about what he is talking of.

Mr. FREAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. No; I can not yield. The gentleman stated with facetious humor, if one might attempt humor in a serious matter of this kind, there were but two gasoline boats on this waterway. As a matter of fact, the engineers report there were 600,000 tons carried in 1912. [Applause.]

Mr. FREAR. Can the gentleman state where that appears? What character of freight was this—logs, or what character of commerce was it?

Mr. SMALL. I will answer the gentleman. It consisted of merchandise, fertilizers, farm products, machinery, lumber, and general freight, such as is exchanged among the States of the Atlantic seaboard. During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, which has not yet been reported, there were 800,000 tons carried, valued at $9,000,000, and yet this commerce was carried through a waterway which has only 8½ feet of water and is altogether inadequate.

When this waterway shall have been completed in accordance with the project reported by the engineers and adopted by Congress in 1912 it will be one of the most important links in the intercoastal waterway and will justify itself amply in the face of all critics. This link from Norfolk to Beaufort is inside of Hatteras and inside of Cape Lookout, the most dangerous menaces to coastwise navigation along the Atlantic seaboard. If there can be any differentiation made between this and the other links of the intracoastal waterway, this is perhaps the most important. This project has been thrashed out many times in this House before the gentleman from Wisconsin ever heard of it. It was discussed——

Mr. FREAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. I will not yield unless the gentleman has some question to ask me that indicates some knowledge of the subject. [Laughter.]

Mr. FREAR. Very well; I will reply in my own time.

Mr. SMALL. This matter has been discussed before the Rivers and Harbors Committee for more than 10 years. There have been at least three reports by eminent engineers, and there never has been an unfavorable report made; and I am almost inclined to say, if I could say it without offense, that there has never been an intelligent man who has had any knowledge of the coastwise trade upon the Atlantic seaboard who ever formed an unfavorable impression or ever expressed any criticism that could be justified. This proposition was reported by the committee and adopted by the Congress, as I said, in 1912. Another appropriation was carried in the bill of 1913, and an additional appropriation is carried, in accordance with the recommendation of the engineers, for an additional $800,000; and it is proposed to be completed in five or six years with annual appropriations in such amounts as can be expended. Mr. Chairman, the criticism of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY], a gentleman whose personality is attractive, has no merit. His opposition to this and other improvements is inexplicable. I am so familiar with this section of the intracoastal waterway from Norfolk to Beaufort, N. C., and the gentleman has been so inaccurate in his statements of fact, I am constrained to suggest with all respect that his attitude is not creditable to his intelligence—is not worthy of consideration by the committee. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired; all debate on this amendment has expired. The question is on the motion to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I have been interested in the lectures we have been listening to from the gentleman——

Mr. SPARKMAN. Will the gentleman yield? I want to ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto end in five minutes.

Mr. DONOVAN. I want three minutes.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I want the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN] to have some little of that time and the gentleman from Pennsylvania wants five minutes and the gentleman from Wisconsin five minutes——

Mr. DONOVAN. Three minutes is all I want.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I ask to make it 13 minutes, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to amend his request by asking unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 13 minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, as I stated a moment ago, we have received lectures here quite constantly from the gentleman from North Carolina, and allow me to say to the committee that the gentleman enjoys the proud distinction of having the high-water mark of appropriations in this bill.

With one exception, he has more appropriations to his credit than any other man. And it does not become any Member here to lecture anyone else, nor for him to presume upon the lack of intelligence or the judgment of any other Member. For instance, he made a gross error a moment ago. He said the gentleman from Wisconsin knew nothing about this place, Albemarle Sound. Why, I lived there. I know Kitty Hawk and I know Albemarle Sound just as well as the gentleman does. I lived in the most God-forsaken place in the whole world, and was sent there to the sandy, dreary coast at Kitty Hawk, where the Wright brothers afterwards went in order to be free from interference or observation by civilized beings while trying their flying machine. There is nothing there except a great expanse of sand. Albemarle Sound is subject to a rise of 2 feet from the wind when it blows across toward the mainland.

Mr. SMALL. What were you doing down on that sand?

Mr. FREAR. I was employed as a telegraph operator in the Signal Service of the Government at Kitty Hawk.

Mr. MOORE. I would like to know when you were last there.

Mr. FREAR. Now, the question I have in mind is this: It is known to every man, if not to the gentleman who comes from that State, that it is absolutely a mud bottom, and I have gone over it frequently, sometimes in a canoe. The mud would not hold an anchor. The rise of the waves in Albemarle Sound, as shown by my reports here, is 2 feet by the wind, and that proposed canal offers practically no protection to small craft in rough weather.

Mr. CALLAWAY. It was 7 feet in the gentleman's own town last December, was it not?

Mr. FREAR. I have forgotten the exact figures. But it seems to me it is not the duty of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL], with the abundance of appropriations he has secured in this bill, to lecture everyone who wants to investigate some of the facts in regard to the bill. We have rights here. We are sent here by our constituents, and my constituents are paying toward that $800,000 appropriation for a worthless canal, and they want to know what they are getting in return for their money. I can tell them from my own knowledge that they will get very little in return, and my judgment is not based upon any engineer's statement nor influenced by fear or favor.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there are a number of objectionable appropriations, and I may refer to one or two in the North Carolina gentleman's State. I will be very glad to do so. I have been trying to keep out of this discussion, but when gentlemen on the floor twit us about our lack of knowledge on these subjects, let me assure them that we are here seeking the best information that we can get, and we are not bound by any report of the engineers, and we want the facts.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am not interested in any of these appropriations. I do not want to hurt the feelings of any gentleman. I have not a particle of interest in one here, in Wisconsin, or elsewhere. It does not make any difference to me, but I want to inquire, and the country is entitled to know, why we are paying out $43,000,000 for these appropriations and getting so little in return. I am willing to give an appropriation to any place where it is justified. But 25 appropriations in a single State, for the purpose simply of getting something for constituents, must be paid for by the rest of the country. Millions of dollars are wasted in this bill, and I am trying to get at the facts, and object to being lectured because of my inquiries.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I think there was an understanding that I was to have five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas desire to speak in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin? We are not proceeding by unanimous consent. Does the gentleman from Texas state that he will speak in opposition to the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR]?

Mr. MOORE. A parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOORE. Is the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY] going to speak in opposition to the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

The CHAIRMAN. That was the inquiry the Chair submitted to him. Does the gentleman wish to speak in opposition to the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. CALLAWAY. Yes, sir. I want to strike out the paragraph, and not strike out the last two words. I am opposed to the motion of the gentleman to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] assumes a great deal of wisdom about this appropriation for Beaufort Inlet and Norfolk, Va. He also is such a pure patriot——

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

Mr. CALLAWAY (continuing). That he wants to give the House information.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will state his point of order.

Mr. CALLAWAY. When I said there were but two gasoline boats there——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY] will suspend.

Mr. CALLAWAY. I do not yield.

Mr. MOORE. I do not ask you to yield. I think the rules forbid a gentleman speaking twice on this proposition. The gentleman has already spoken once.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is speaking to a different motion now.

Mr. CALLAWAY. I said that there were two through boats running from Beaufort, N. C., to Norfolk, Va., drawing 5 feet of water each, and making one round trip a week each, and that one of them was a gasoline boat owned and operated in the oil business by the Standard Oil Co. and another carried other kinds of freight. He never denied that. If there are any other through boats running from Beaufort Inlet, N. C., to Norfolk, Va., why does he not state what boats they are? He says that he is acquainted with the territory and knows the freight carried. Why is he not honest with this House? Why does he not state the names of the firms operating other through craft on that canal? They are not there.

I will state another proposition—and I got my information from reliable sources, because I had been making inquiries during the whole time—that there was not an ocean-going steamer that put in at Beaufort, N. C., last year.

He did not deny that, but he dodges and trims, and says there is so much of this kind of freight and so much of the other kind of freight. It might not have gone a mile on that canal. It might have gone on the canal for 150 yards, or for a mile and a half, and then been taken off. He does not state a thing about the number of ton-miles freight was carried on it. That is the information that the House wants, but the House never gets it.

Then the gentleman talks about my intelligence. I do not care anything about his references to my intelligence, but I tell you what I do know, and I wish to God that every man, woman, and child in this country knew it, and that is that no man on earth would vote for such a damnable outrage on the Federal Treasury as this is if he was not directly or indirectly interested in it. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Everybody in this country who has studied the question at all knows what an unmitigated outrage this river and harbor bill is, and that there are items from start to find, from stem to stern, from alpha to omega, so bad that if the people knew they would kick this Congress out of commission if they continued to waste money in this way.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOORE. My point of order is that the gentleman is not opposing the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR].

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not distinguish in such a case.

Mr. MOORE. Then I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman has no right to make personal aspersions on Members of the House. He says no one would support this item who had not a personal interest in it. The gentleman has made that statement.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I started out by saying that every Member of this House had not only thousands, but hundreds of thousands of dollars expended in his district or in his State in a way to attract private interests located there, people that would be directly interested, and they did that in order to get that money expended in their respective districts or States.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, as one member of the committee, I would like to have the gentleman point out where I have hundreds of thousands of dollars carried in this bill to be expended in my district. I am a member of the committee, and I have a right to ask the gentleman to say where hundreds of thousands of dollars are to be expended in my district.

Mr. CALLAWAY. I will say to the gentleman that——

Mr. TREADWAY. I will be glad to tell the gentleman where my district is, and have him locate one project on which hundreds of thousands of dollars is expended there.

Mr. CALLAWAY. The gentleman told the committee he hoped to see the Connecticut River improved, and looked forward to the time when hundreds of thousands of dollars would be expended for its improvement.

Mr. TREADWAY. I ask the gentleman to point out where I have hundreds of thousands of dollars carried in this bill. The gentleman is impugning the members of the committee.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. And, Mr. Chairman, I want the gentleman to point out where the money is going to my district.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Who are you? [Laughter.]

A MEMBER. Keokuk.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman shows his ignorance when he asks the question.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Gentlemen must proceed in order.

Mr. MADDEN. I make a point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MADDEN. My point of order is that the matter before the House is a motion to strike out the last word, and the gentleman is not confining himself to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman made a motion first to strike out the paragraph. He is now speaking in opposition to the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] to strike out the last word.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, this is not to be taken out of my time, I hope.

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, no. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say——

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I hope the Chair will not take this out of my time. I want to answer the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KENNEDY].

Mr. MADDEN. This is not to come out of the gentleman's time. My point, Mr. Chairman, is that if a gentleman moves to strike out the last word, the only thing before the House is the discussion of that motion, and he must confine himself to that motion strictly.

The CHAIRMAN. That has never been the custom of the House.

Mr. MADDEN. If it has not been the custom of the House heretofore, I shall insist that that shall be the custom now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is at a loss as to just how you could construe a motion to strike out the last word.

Mr. MADDEN. There have been rulings by former Chairmen to the effect that when a Member moves to strike out the last word his whole debate must be confined to the motion. That may not have been the practice, but that is the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will have to consult the authorities before making a ruling as to that.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KENNEDY] wants to know what interest he has in this bill. The whole of his district lies alongside of the Mississippi River, where it is now proposed in this bill to spend $7,000,000 this year, and God knows what in the future. He is up there near that Keokuk Dam proposition where they are generating power.

Mr. MOORE. A private corporation is doing that. The Government has nothing to do with that.

Mr. CALLAWAY. No man on the Mississippi River is disinterested in this great appropriation. They have been working for years to get an appropriation to make the Mississippi River navigable up to Duluth [laughter]; and up in that country, along there, the Mississippi River passes the territory of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. MOORE. Duluth is not on the Mississippi River. The gentleman is in error again.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will proceed in order.

Mr. CALLAWAY. I mean the city of Minneapolis.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Gentlemen must not interrupt. The gentleman must conform to the rules.

Mr. MOORE. I have been trying, Mr. Chairman, to conform to the rules. Every point of order I have made, whether right or wrong, has been ruled on adversely.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is in error.

Mr. MOORE. Then I beg the Chair's pardon.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman should get recognition before interrupting a gentleman on the floor. That is the only protection a gentleman has. The time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY] has expired. The question is on the motion to strike out the paragraph. All debate on the motion to strike out is exhausted.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi want to prolong this debate?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I want to strike out the last three words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi moves to strike out the last three words.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I am satisfied that neither the gentleman from Texas nor any other gentleman thinks that I am interested in this bill. [Laughter.] Whenever any item, it matters not what, is reached in the rivers and harbors bill the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY] conducts himself in such a manner as to recall to my mind a song that the gentleman and myself both used to hear many years ago when we lived down on the old plantation. It went about like this:

My old massa had a dog,
And he was three parts hound;
And every time he struck the track
He bounced up off the ground.

[Laughter.]

Mr. COX. What is the chorus?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. When the gentleman from Texas begins to discuss this intercoastal canal he not only bounces up off the ground but he rarely comes back to earth. Now, I have no special interest in the intercoastal canal or in that particular section of it which is now under consideration.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Just wait a minute. I want to put some ground under the gentleman's feet, for him to stand upon. [Laughter.] The gentleman says there is no commerce on this canal except what is carried by two little gasoline boats, one of them guilty of the unpardonable crime of being the property of the Standard Oil Co. As a matter of fact, the commerce carried through that canal in 1912, the year before we purchased it, was 413,764 tons. Now, it would have required nearly 500 trains, each one loaded beyond the capacity of an average freight train in this country, traveling 24 hours every day in the year, to have moved that traffic 25 miles. Now, see, when we get down to the facts, when we come to the actual commerce borne through this canal, how little justification there is for the gentleman's statement that the only traffic there is by two little gasolene boats. As a matter of fact, there were many boats traveling through that canal, loaded with valuable commerce, in which all the people were interested. In addition to that, there was paralleling it another canal, also privately owned, both these canals charging tolls, and the other canal did more business than this one. Now, it is a reasonable expectation that when the Government acquires this canal and makes it a free waterway and improves it as we contemplate improving it the traffic hereafter of both those canals, particularly all the through traffic, will go on this one canal; and it is entirely reasonable to suppose that the traffic on this canal, after it is completed, will be at least 800,000 or 1,000,000 tons a year. Now, we can understand figures only by comparison. They are important only relatively. When we recall the fact that, according to the estimate, only 1,250,000 tons of American tonnage are to pass through the Panama Canal, you can readily understand that this canal, which is going to carry a million tons, or almost as much as the Panama Canal will carry of American tonnage, is not an unworthy project upon which to expend the public money.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in five minutes.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I desire to speak for five minutes on this. I have asked now on several occasions——

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman speaks so little that we ought to give it to him. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPARKMAN. I will say, then, after eight minutes.

Mr. MOORE. May I have five minutes of that time?

Mr. MADDEN. I shall object unless it is limited to five minutes.

Mr. MOORE. Then I object.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto be now closed.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DONOVAN. I can not lose the floor by a motion of that character, can I? I was recognized by the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair had recognized the gentleman from Connecticut. Does the gentleman from Florida make his motion for five minutes?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I move that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida moves that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, just a word about these points of order. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] knows better than to make such a frivolous point of order. [Laughter.] The rule says that for the purposes of debate or explanation, where no amendment is intended or contemplated, the motion to make a pro forma amendment is in order. It is not intended or expected that anyone shall discuss the question whether one or two words shall be stricken out.

Mr. GORDON. Or three words.

Mr. DONOVAN. It is done for the purpose of making an explanation; and when the gentleman made the point of order he was making a frivolous point of order, and for a man of his experience as a legislator he was doing something that a new Member would think ridiculous. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, just a word in regard to the matter before us, and that is the appropriation of $800,000 for this inland waterway at Beaufort, N. C. Last year it received an appropriation of $1,400,000. I have a small interest down in that country. I spent eight weeks there lately, and what the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY] says about the amount of business on the water there is true. The way I had of going from Beaufort up to where I went, it took about six hours, and I had to go on a little mail boat. There is no other means of transportation. It is a fishing country, a place for the raising of oysters. At Beaufort, N. C., there is no dock except for the purpose of landing fish and landing passengers who go fishing, and to talk about a traffic of several hundred thousand tons on that sound is ridiculous. The traffic is wholly in the products of the water there. That is one of the white counties in North Carolina, very sparsely settled, very sparsely populated. Business! Where is the business? The houses may be a quarter of a mile apart. What do the people do there? They get their living out of the water raising oysters, catching fish, crabs, and lobsters, and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY] was telling the truth about it. Now, they got $1,400,000 last year. Here they get $800,000, and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL], the distinguished governor, is going to shoo everybody out of here by accusing them of their lack of knowledge of what is going on in that particular sound.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion to strike out.

The motion was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Meherrin River, N. C.: For maintenance, $1,000.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I am going to use this five minutes to say something in reply to what the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY] has been saying about the intercoastal waterway. I have some interest in it in a public way. From the remarks of some gentlemen it might be inferred that some Members of Congress have more than a public interest in the matter. This inland waterway along the coast is gravely misunderstood in this House by some Members, and especially by the gentleman from Texas. He finds particular fault with the link of the waterway extending from Norfolk to Beaufort, and says that only small craft are there, and that it is inconsequential. I want to say to the gentleman that instead of being an inconsequential link it is an absolutely essential link to a connected waterway, and if anything is to be done within the coast line, as it ought to be, the connection of Beaufort with Norfolk is necessary.

I also want to point out, so long as the gentleman from Wisconsin has stated that he knew the territory and went over the sand dunes with the Wright brothers when they experimented with their flying machine, that I have been down there two or three times myself. On one occasion I tramped through a great swamp from Adams Creek over to Core Creek. I went through with hip boots, over 6 or 7 miles of swamp and some solid land. I refer to this because I want to present a contrast showing that there is some progress in this improvement, and that there is merit in it.

I tramped through the swamp following the course of the cut known as the Beaufort Cut, through a territory that was wild and waste; but the second time I went through there it was on a vessel drawing about 10 feet of water. Whereas before there had been a very sparse population, we saw 3,000 people gathered along the banks of the new canal. They came there to hail with great acclaim the work that the Government had done, furnishing an outlet to the sea safe behind the dangerous shoals of Cape Hatteras. These 3,000 people had come to give praise to the United States for having by this 7-mile cut opened up their country north and south in addition to giving them a free outlet to the sea. Were there any boats? We had not seen one two years before. Yes; there were hundreds of them. Where did they come from? They came from out of the little rivers and channels that connected with this canal. What did they bring? They brought oysters, cotton, produce—whatever the farm yielded. They could now get to a market, which they had not been able to do before. They were raising this produce along the banks of the canal. Was that all? No. Vessels were passing through from New England, from the very State which the gentleman over yonder comes from, the gentleman who opposed this proposition and ridiculed it, calling Beaufort a mere fishing station. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN] does not fairly represent the people of his State when he refers slightingly to this waterway. Hundreds and perhaps thousands of them have their boats covered with tarpaulins up in Connecticut now, when they might be in service in southern waters if they knew the intracoastal canal was available throughout. This coastal project is a great link between the North and the South, and, once completed, will make perpetual intercourse between the people of the North and the South, it will unite the winter with the summer, and it ought not to be discouraged in this House. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania withdraws his pro forma amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 4980. An act to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and for other purposes," approved March 9, 1914.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate bill (S. 4250) entitled "An act to authorize the county commissioners of Skagit County, Wash., to construct a bridge across Swinomish Slough, opposite the town of La Conner."

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Scuppernong River, N. C.: For maintenance, $2,000; completing improvement in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 1196, Sixty-second Congress, third session, $31,800; in all, $33,800.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph. This is the eighth proposition of North Carolina and runs over onto the other page, and is continued in our next. [Laughter.] There is not a village on this stream. I think that is the evidence. I will read from page 2 of the report of the engineer. This is the Scuppernong River, in North Carolina:

2. Scuppernong River, on the southern shore of Albemarle Sound, has been under improvement by the United States since 1876 under projects providing for dredging the bar, making cut-offs at sharp bends, and removing obstructions from the channel up to Spruills Bridge, the landing for the village of Creswell, 23 miles above the mouth. Cherry, 26 miles from its mouth, is head of navigation, to which point 5 feet can be carried at mean low water. Existing depths in the stream appear to be ample for the boats now using it, but above Cross Landing navigation is rendered difficult on account of the bends and obstructions.

Now, on page 6 of the report it says:

There are eight landings between Columbia and Spruills Bridge. There are two wharves at the latter place, owned by private parties, which are open to the public at the rate of $3 per day.

You pay $3 a day for the privilege of landing on a stream upon which the Government puts in about $33,800.

On page 8 it gives the tremendous amount of transportation and freight and commerce that goes through the Scuppernong. It says, page 8, that in 1908 there was 12,500 tons and in 1909 20,000 tons. But the most of that was lumber logged down the stream, and that would be logged whether you put in this $33,800 or not. Exclusive of lumber, in 1908 there was 5,786 tons, and in 1909, 3,783.

On page 9 it says:

The construction of the extension of the Norfolk Southern Railroad from Mackeys Ferry in 1908 and the financial panic of that year combined to reduce the commerce reported in 1907 by 82 per cent in 1908.

That is the proposition, the creek, you are asked to put $33,800 into. I do not care to make any further comment on it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin to strike out the paragraph.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Northeast, Black, and Cape Fear Rivers, N. C.: For maintenance of improvement of Northeast and Black Rivers and of Cape Fear River above Wilmington, N. C., $13,000; completing improvement of Northeast River, in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 1356, Sixty-second Congress, third session, and subject to the conditions set forth in said document, $25,375; in all, $38,375.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I realize it is perfectly useless to move to strike out that paragraph, no matter what state of facts is presented here. Yet I feel it is my duty in this connection to explain that this is one of those fertilizer cases that you are asked to expend $38,375 on in order that three companies, or several of them, may be helped out—companies that have a commerce of 113,700 tons. The report says that considerable interest had been manifested in securing an extension of deep water for a further distance of about 1½ miles; that on this stretch are located several important fertilizer factories having a combined commerce estimated at 113,700 tons. The board states that the three fertilizer factories now have a considerable tonnage and that that would be affected by a more commodious channel; that such a channel would result in a material saving in the handling of their heavier commodities.

Well, I suppose it would. To continue:

It appears that these concerns would be directly benefited, while the general public would be indirectly benefited by the work. After mature consideration the board reports that in its opinion it is advisable for the United States to undertake the construction of a channel 150 feet wide and 22 feet deep, as proposed by the district officer, provided local or other interests will contribute one-half of the cost of first construction.

I will ask the chairman of the committee if they contributed one-half?

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I think I can answer the question.

Mr. FREAR. I am directing my inquiry to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. PAYNE. A high private will not do.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I have not had time to look that over.

Mr. FREAR. Then I will accept the answer of the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. SPARKMAN. The clerk of the committee tells me that the localities have contributed one-half.

Mr. FREAR. An excellent provision, it seems to me, and it ought to be in practically every proposition; but I do not think the Government of the United States should expend $38,375 to help out fertilizer factories.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. Does the gentleman mean to say that the only people who will be benefited by this expenditure of $38,375 are private fertilizer companies?

Mr. FREAR. Three fertilizer companies, says the report of the engineer. Of course it is a mighty good thing to have some one here to get those things through Congress, if you want to vote them, but it does seem to me there ought to be a limit to the character of appropriations that are made by this Congress or any other Congress, and I call on the gentlemen on the other side, who have made professions of economy in their platform, to explain the necessity for this appropriation, and to show a better record than is being made on this appropriation bill.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Certainly.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Does the gentleman not think that possibly the fertilizer companies with whom we were dealing in New Jersey on Saturday dealt with the fertilizer companies in North Carolina and South Carolina, and that they will deal with the other fertilizer companies all the way around the coast?

Mr. FREAR. Well, in some way or other the fertilization has had a wonderful effect on the growth of the appropriations here. I move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin to strike out the paragraph.

The motion was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Deep Creek, N. C.: Completing improvement in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 1383, Sixty-second Congress, third session, and subject to the conditions set forth in said document, $5,400.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I desired to explain the condition in Bennett Creek; but if there is any objection I will not do that, but will go right to Deep Creek, which is the item now under consideration.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the rules of the House observed. The gentleman has a right to make a motion and then talk to his motion.

Mr. FREAR. That is correct. I move to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. SMALL. To which paragraph is the motion made?

Mr. FREAR. To Deep Creek. Bennett Creek got past me before I saw it, and that is safe.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 20, by striking out the paragraph included in lines 18 to 22, inclusive.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, Bennett River is Bennett Creek, and is known by that name except when it gets into the hands of an engineer or into a printed report before Congress. I would say there is a very interesting line of reading for anyone if he would only take up these matters, as I did on the advice of members of the committee, to ascertain the facts. I have been endeavoring to do that; but no matter what I present here, no matter how absurd the conditions, no matter what local service is to be given, in every case the committee is supported. As the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] well said, there will not be a chance to get anything in or out of this bill. It is locked in there and you have thrown away the key. There is no chance. But I just want to say a word about Deep Creek as long as I can not get back to Bennett Creek. The district officer says that the annual commerce of the locality is estimated at 2,000 tons. Think of it! Such a tremendous amount! That commerce is at present handled by rail through Scuppernong. That is the town of the Scuppernong grape. I read:

The division engineer is of opinion that this short stream is unworthy of improvement by the United States.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. As the gentleman read I caught it that the division officer said that this was inadvisable.

Mr. FREAR. Certainly. I read again:

The division engineer is of opinion that this short stream is unworthy of improvement by the United States.

Mr. MURDOCK. Did the Chief of Engineers overrule this man?

Mr. FREAR. So I understand. Yes.

3. There is a population of about 700 within 3 miles of the stream, the principal occupation being farming. The annual commerce is estimated at 2,000 tons, valued at $157,000, which commerce is at present handled by rail through Scuppernong. In connection with his preliminary examination, the district officer gave a public hearing, at which interested parties explained the needs of improvement, and on June 3 Hon. J. H. SMALL, M. C., came before the board for a similar purpose.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. DONOVAN. Is that the gentleman know as Gov. SMALL, a member of the committee here?

Mr. FREAR. I will say this: I believe the gentleman who is representing North Carolina is doing precisely what has been done for years. I have not a single criticism to make against him individually. I realize this, that he is following the practice that has been indulged in——

Mr. DONOVAN. That is what is called in naval circles "plucking."

Mr. FREAR. I realize that has been the course pursued for years, and the practice speaks for itself.

Mr. SMALL rose.

Mr. FREAR. Does the gentleman desire to ask a question?

Mr. SMALL. I desire to address myself to a discussion of this subject when the gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. FREAR. My time has not expired. I will say this: When it is shown that a project is rejected by subordinate engineers but they are overruled by the Chief of Engineers, there is a reason, and it should be given to the House for the action of the Chief of Engineers.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, it is true this is only a small stream, and particularly it is true the improvement of it would benefit those who are engaged in agriculture. This stream empties into Albemarle Sound and penetrates the interior of a thrifty farming population where lands are fertile, and the people living there are without any transportation facilities and they are compelled to haul their products a number of miles to the nearest railroad station, and by reason of that condition this small appropriation recommended by the Chief of Engineers has received the favorable recommendation of the committee and, as I believe, ought to receive that of the House. The tonnage there, while it may seem to be small, and the value may seem to be small, yet it must be remembered that it affords transportation facilities to a locality which is practically without any facilities at the present time. This report was made by Gen. W. H. Bixby, and I take it what he means by the statement that he is familiar with conditions there, he recurs to the time when he was district engineer at Norfolk and at Wilmington, N. C., being included in this section, and he is entirely familiar with the waters tributary to Albemarle Sound.

Mr. Chairman, something has been said about the activity of members of the committee and about the number of projects they have been able to include in this bill. So far as my congressional district is concerned there are only three projects, Pamlico, Tar River, upon which my town happens to be located, the Scuppernong River, and the Meherrin River, all of which carry appropriations of less than $50,000. There are two other congressional districts in my State which have provisions in this bill larger in amount than are those included in my district; but I need not make any defense before the committee.

I have as I conceive the respect of my colleagues upon this committee, and it is their respect and good opinion which I value. I believe that the membership of this House do not believe that I would take advantage of being upon any committee in order to foist a project without merit upon the committee and the House. There is not a single project in this bill which has not had prior investigation in the manner which has been repeatedly pointed out here and finally comes with the recommendation of the Chief of Engineers, through the recommendation of the district engineer and division engineers and Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors; but it is only natural that there will be some divergence of opinion at times between those four coordinate boards, and in this case there happens to be a difference of opinion between two of them. The district engineer and the Chief of Engineers agreed with each other. The Board of Engineers, known familiarly as the board of review, disagreed with the Chief of Engineers, but no one, I take it, can read this report, particularly one who is familiar with that section, but will have to say these people in that thrifty agricultural center there are entitled to this slight appropriation in order to make navigable a stream which thereby gives them transportation to the outside world.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin to strike out the paragraph.

The question was taken, and the motion was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Coosa River, Ga. and Ala.: Continuing improvement and for maintenance between Rome, Ga., and Dam No. 4, Ala., $65,000.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out lines 20, 21, and 22. I have been unable to give any examination to most of these items, and have not presented many of those I did have to the committee because I realize it is useless. I have offered amendments because I believed some items objectionable. I have acted with that motive in view. In regard to this Coosa River improvement, my attention was called to it by a published article which declared it to be a pork-barrel proposition, and which stated not one dollar in commerce is shipped from Rome down to the ocean at the present time, after all these years; and I desire to ask the chairman of the committee if that is true.

How many years has this appropriation been continued?

Mr. SPARKMAN. The improvement on that river has been going on for quite a number of years.

Mr. FREAR. Has there been a dollar's worth of commerce shipped on the river?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I do not think there is any through commerce there. There are two stretches of the river.

Mr. FREAR. I understand all the conditions. I was just asking that one question. I know about the river. I have studied it in the engineers' report and every other place where I could get any information. But it has not helped me to ascertain whether any commerce had reached the Gulf from that river.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Reaches what river?

Mr. FREAR. The Coosa River.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Of course, the commerce on the Coosa——

Mr. FREAR. My question is, Is there commerce from Rome down to where these canal locks are? I have forgotten how many of them.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I will say to the gentleman that there were 52,300 tons reported for the fiscal year 1913.

Mr. FREAR. On just a part of the river. That is local. That must be true, because I have here a statement to that effect. I examined the engineer's report for 1913, and he says no commerce has gone through Lock 4, in Alabama. I refer to page 134, Volume II. And here is the report of the engineer for 1909. There has been an estimated cost of $6,602,529 on this project. The estimated cost from Rome to the railroad bridge was $1,496,107, and from there down to Wetumpka $5,106,402. This work was begun in 1900. It has been running for 14 years. There are 23 locks and dams. And the engineer's report for 1909 says:

As yet no benefit has been derived from the improvement, and its value is entirely dependent on the completion of the entire system.

Here we have been for 14 years and no further advanced, apparently, than when we began, and it seems to me it would be well to strike that paragraph out until there is an investigation had as to whether it is advisable to go on with the expenditure of all this vast sum of money without any propsect of getting anything for it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say just a few words in response to the remarks made by the gentleman. That improvement there has not yet been completed, and, of course, until the improvements are completed and until all these locks and dams are completed there can not be any through commerce; that is, from Rome down to the mouth of the river.

Mr. FREAR. Will the gentleman yield just a moment? There are railroad lines along the river?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Oh, yes; but that does not remove the necessity for making this improvement. I am under the impression, and have always been under the impression, that this is a very desirable improvement, and when that work is completed the river, running, as it does, through a very fertile section of the country, will no doubt carry a very important commerce. Fifty-two thousand tons is not a small commerce, though not, perhaps, as large as we would expect when we consider the entire amount of money that has been expended and the amount that is to be expended. But certainly when the improvement is completed commerce will increase satisfactorily. It must, in the very nature of things, grow, and that greatly.

Mr. MURDOCK. Is the final estimate on this work $6,000,000? Is that correct?

Mr. FREAR. Six million six hundred and two thousand dollars. I have the figures here as they appear in the report.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I will say to the gentleman I do not recall. It is somewhere in that neighborhood.

Mr. MURDOCK. Has the gentleman anything that will show what the cost has been up to the present time?

Mr. SPARKMAN. The cost up to the present time on the Coosa River is $1,938,583.

Mr. MURDOCK. I would like to ask the gentleman from Florida, while it is true there is no other traffic on this river up to date, there is considerable local traffic up and down the river?

Mr. SPARKMAN. The tonnage shows there is a considerable local traffic there.

Mr. MURDOCK. And is the tonnage such as to justify the past expenditures?

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is a question each must answer for himself. I should say yes. The present tonnage is not very large, and the amount expended is considerable—52,000 tons of commerce as against $2,000,000 that have been expended—but the tonnage will undoubtedly grow.

Mr. MURDOCK. What I have in mind is, Are we not throwing good money after bad?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I do not think so.

Mr. MURDOCK. Do you think when we get this stream improved from the head to the mouth it will justify the expenditure of $6,000,000?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I think so.

Mr. DENT. Is it not the object of the committee to connect the Coosa River with the navigation at Montgomery, Ala., in order to secure through transportation, and is it not a fact that the reason that has not been done is on account of the rocks in the Coosa River and because the dams have not been completed yet? And also is it not a fact that it goes through the richest mineral territory there is anywhere in this country?

Mr. FREAR. If the gentleman will yield, is it not true that the railroads parallel the river all the way down?

Mr. DENT. Not through there.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I do not know of any railroad there.

Mr. CALLAWAY. The gentleman from Florida states that when they get this thing fixed all the way through he is looking for through freight. I want to know why the chairman thinks there will be through freight on that river when there is none on the Mississippi, Ohio, or any other stream in the country?

Mr. SPARKMAN. The gentleman has asked that question several times, and I will now answer. If his premises were correct, his argument would be irresistible; but, unfortunately for his argument, his premises are not correct, because the tonnage on the Mississippi River has been increasing in the last several years.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Let me finish. I heard the gentleman a while ago. Of course he did not intend to make a misstatement, but it was lack of information on his part. He stated the tonnage on the river has been decreasing all the time. He came down to 1906 and, I think, stopped there. He should have gone further. There was a time when the tonnage was very large on that river, both above and below the mouth of the Ohio. Then there came a time when it fell off. Now the tonnage is growing very rapidly.

Mr. MURDOCK. What year was that dividing point? When did it start up again?

Mr. SPARKMAN. It must have been about 1906, because now the total tonnage on the river from St. Paul down to New Orleans is over 7,000,000 tons.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes.

Mr. FREAR. What are you reading from?

Mr. SPARKMAN. From the engineers' report.

Mr. FREAR. Furnished by whom?

Mr. SPARKMAN. By the engineers. I think the most accurate reports we get are from that source.

Now, above the mouth of the Ohio the tonnage is 2,375,000 tons.

Mr. MURDOCK. That is about ten millions annually?

Mr. SPARKMAN. No. I stated it altogether at first. It is about seven millions annually; that is, it seems to have reached that figure last year.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Florida has expired.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for two minutes more.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Florida be entitled to five minutes more. I want to ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

Mr. MADDEN. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] objects. The question is on the motion to strike out the paragraph.

The question was taken, and the motion was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving harbor at Fernandina, Fla.: For maintenance, including the entrance channel through Cumberland Sound, Georgia and Florida, $25,000.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. FREAR. You can not gain time by taking advantage of the chairman of the committee and taking him off his feet.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I object to the insinuations of the gentleman. I was exercising my right as a Member of the House.

Mr. FREAR. I was not criticizing anybody individually. I am speaking of the membership of the House.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman was addressing me.

Mr. FREAR. The gentleman should not be so supersensitive.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not propose to be criticized by the gentleman or anybody else. The gentleman must conform himself to the rules.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I ask that this shall not be taken from my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that nobody should be criticized for insisting that the rules of the House be observed. The Chair is trying to do the best he can.

Mr. FREAR. The Chair is very kind and courteous to us all. We are trying to get information here.

Mr. MADDEN. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that I do not propose to be criticized when I am simply performing my duty as a Member of the House. And when the gentleman thinks he can get the floor and insinuate that somebody else is censurable because they do their duty, I shall not permit that game to be played.

Mr. FREAR. It does not behoove me, Mr. Chairman, to say that I am "playing a game." I am simply trying to ascertain how to vote upon this proposition.

Mr. MADDEN. You are making a lot of noise about it.

Mr. FREAR. Yes; I am making a noise, and it is the right and privilege of every Representative to do that, and it can not be taken away.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask the committee chairman what is the tonnage on the northern part of the river from St. Paul down to St. Louis, according to your statistics?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Two million seven hundred and fifty thousan tons are the figures I have.

Mr. FREAR. Does that consist of logs? How much of it consists of logs? Have you divided it up?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I have the books where I could find it. I think the logs are about all gone, up that way.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Certainly.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman state the relative value of a ton of logs and a ton of ore that goes through the Soo Canal?

Mr. FREAR. I will say that it does not need a dollar's worth of improvement on the Mississippi River to-day to log the stream. We logged there for 50 years without a dollar's worth of improvement being placed on the stream. I say that with actual knowledge of the fact. At my home town, for instance, there were hundreds of thousands of tons, presumably, that went past every year. A few years ago there were great rafts of logs that went by, one right after the other. But we have not a raft to-day, and I presume we do not ship on that river to-day 20,000 tons a year. The shipping is all gone. The river is a mile wide, and large boats can come up that river, but the shipping is not there. The river is paralleled on both sides by railroads.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. What river is the gentleman referring to?

Mr. FREAR. The St. Croix. It is a mile wide.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I thought the gentleman was talking about the Mississippi River.

Mr. FREAR. It is a branch of the Mississippi. The gentleman was talking about logging. You do not need an appropriation of $9,000,000 on that stream, the Mississippi, for logging they float down the river.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Does the gentleman think commerce consists of logs, taking the upper Mississippi from the Missouri River up to St. Paul?

Mr. FREAR. The Mississippi?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Yes. The value of that commerce was $27,000,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, that the discussion of the commerce on the Mississippi River is not in order in connection with the item relating to Fernandina Harbor, Fla.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will confine himself to the discussion of the paragraph.

Mr. FREAR. That may be possible, Mr. Chairman. I asked the chairman of the committee to explain to the House what the character of this improvement is for which $25,000 is recommended.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, the $25,000 is for maintenance. The amount appropriated here is for the maintenance of the harbor.

Mr. FREAR. Does the gentleman know what the character of it is? Is he familiar with the facts?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Am I familiar with the character of what?

Mr. FREAR. Of this improvement.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I say it is for the maintenance of the harbor.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Oklawaha River, Fla., in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 514, Sixty-third Congress, second session, and subject to the conditions set forth in said document, $175,000.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out this paragraph. I dislike to criticize this item, because it is in the State of the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors [Mr. SPARKMAN] and he has been exceptionally kind to us in his treatment of those who are making inquiries here to-day. The chairman of the committee referred to this item the other day and stated the facts to be substantially as I understand them. I think the item ought not to be carried in the bill for reasons which I will state.

As I understand it, the Oklawaha River is a stream about 94 miles long, which is to be dug out to an additional depth for the purpose of helping the shipping of oranges. There are two or three things about this project that are very interesting. I will make a brief statement about it.

This is a crooked river, 94 miles long, emptying into the St. Johns. The Government has expended to date on the river $47,516.36. The commerce created is 100,000 tons, four-fifths of which is floating logs. The net commerce exclusive of logs is stated on page 10 of House Document 514, containing the engineer's report, to be 20,000 tons. On page 20 it is stated that there is no regular boat line. Providing a boat service of twice a week is guaranteed, the United States engineer recommends the following Government expenditure:

Estimated cost of improvements	$733,000
In addition to amount expended of	47,516
Four years to build, interest 2 years, at 4 per cent	62,400
Government expense when complete	842,916
Annual cost, 4 per cent interest	33,716
Maintenance charge	12,000
Operation expense, including locks	15,000
Estimated annual expense to Government	60,716

Now, as to the benefits to come. The net boat commerce now is 20,000 tons. The estimated commerce is entirely problematical. There is water power to be given to Kyle & Young. There will be freight from 4,000 acres when reclaimed by Kyle & Young, who are among the vigorous advocates of this scheme, but the extent of prospective freight is entirely speculative. This project is proposed in order to get competitive freight rates without, however, guaranteeing any additional water commerce. The present freight rates are rates that the State of Florida should regulate and lower, wherever justified by the State railway commission. The project has high political indorsement, as appears from exhibits attached to the report. In justice to the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, let me say that it is not his. Now, there are one or two things here that do appear very interesting. I read from page 10 of this document:

This river has been under improvement since 1891, when a project was adopted for clearing the river of obstructions so as to give a 4-foot channel depth at mean low water from the mouth to Leesburg, a distance of 94 miles. This project was modified in 1907 by providing for a channel 6 feet deep at mean low water from the mouth of the river to the head of Silver Springs Run. The total expenditures have been $47,516.36, about one-half having been used for maintenance.

Mr. Chairman, it is now proposed to expend in addition the sum of $733,000, largely for the purpose of reducing railway freight rates when bringing oranges to market. There is not a single boat line on the river, and the only assurance asked by the Government is that a boat line shall be established, no contributions from local interests toward this $733,000. The river is a crooked stream, nearly 100 miles long. Nothing floating there to-day except occasional little boats; that is to say, no regular boat line. We are advised 20,000 tons of freight outside of the logs and lumber can be shipped and has been shipped in the past and would be shipped in the future without any additional expenditure by the Government. So it seems to me there is no question that this appropriation should not be made. I speak of this with some hesitation because of my admiration for the way in which we have been treated by the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors; but I believe the proposition is without a particle of merit, while it involves an expenditure of practically three-quarters of a million dollars.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is somewhat mistaken as to the extent of the navigation on that river. I may say there are two stretches of the river: First, from the mouth, where it runs into the St. Johns, up to what is known as Silver Springs Run; second, from the mouth of Silver Springs Run to Lake Zora. Below the mouth of Silver Springs Run there is plenty of water for the purposes of commerce. This improvement is almost entirely for the stretch above the mouth of that run, something like 30 or 40 miles. This improvement will open up a lake region of something like 100 miles in area, having more than 112 miles of lake frontage. This is one of the richest orange-producing sections in the State, but other things are produced there, such as farm products. The chief business, however, is the growing of citrous fruits, an industry that is very successfully carried on.

In addition to these, there are millions of tons of kaolin, a great deal of which is carried out every year; not by water, because the boats can not run to any great extent as yet from Silver Springs up to Lake Griffin, where these kaolin mines are located. It may be found in other places, but chiefly on and near Lake Griffin. One of the main purposes of the improvement is to furnish transportation for this kaolin.

Mr. FREAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I will.

Mr. FREAR. Does it not seem a pretty high amount to pay—nearly $20,000 a mile—for that particular part that needs to be improved?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I could answer the gentleman by saying no, but that is not all. I believe, Mr. Chairman, the development of the country resulting from this improvement, extending as it does through that rich and beautiful lake region, will pay for itself many times over.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I will.

Mr. MURDOCK. How far is it, as the crow flies, from the mouth of the Silver Springs landing to the St. John River?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Fifty-three miles. No; not as the crow flies; I think it is not more than half that.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman from Wisconsin gave the length of the stream to be improved as 94 miles. I wanted to arrive at how crooked it is. Is it a very crooked river?

Mr. SPARKMAN. The length of river to be improved is less than that.

Mr. MURDOCK. Is there any railroad transportation there to-day?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Oh, yes; there are two railroads traversing the section.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman says that there are kaolin deposits there; have they been developed?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Some of them have been developed and some not, because the railroads do not extend to them.

Mr. MURDOCK. Then the deposits of kaolin are not mythical?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Oh, no; the report says that there are millions of tons of kaolin there. I do not know how much. It is true, Mr. Chairman, that the engineers have reported adversely on a project for a canal across the State of Florida, and I can not say whether they will ever report favorably, but I believe that some time in the future, if the country continues to develop, there will be a canal across Florida, and whenever there is, it will no doubt run along the line of the Oklawaha River.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] to strike out the paragraph.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Kissimmee River, Fla., in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 137, Sixty-third Congress, first session, $47,000.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph. This is the last matter I am going to present to-day. I thank the gentlemen kindly for their patience and courtesy. You will at least give me credit for having confined myself to the questions under discussion; that I have not talked politics or tariff. I read from the report of the engineers, on page 5:

4. The Kissimmee River has been under improvement since 1903 under a project which provides for a channel 3 feet deep and from 30 to 60 feet wide from the town of Kissimmee to Fort Bassenger. The limiting depth in this river is now about 2 feet. There has been expended on the project about $30,400.

5. In his report on preliminary examination under the act of 1909, the district officer reports that three small steamboats drawing about 2 feet and 50 to 60 launches are in use on the river; that these boats can be operated at ordinary low stages of the water, but that navigation practically ceases during long-continued dry weather. He states that there appears to be about 10,000 tons of freight handled on the Kissimmee River and 30,000 tons in the town of Kissimmee.

On this creek in 1907 there were eight months of dry weather. In 1908 it was dry for five months, and as the gentleman from Illinois well suggested a few days ago, it ought to be insured against fire. [Laughter.]

Now, on page 15, I want to read a letter from G. F. Kribbs, dated at Kissimmee, Fla., March 27, 1909. It is as follows:

KISSIMMEE, FLA., March 27, 1909.

DEAR SIR: The tract of land I mentioned to you is the Fort Gardner lands, 25,339 acres, and is owned, by recent purchase, by E. W. Bowen & Co., Delphi, Ind. These lands lie between lakes Cypress, Hatcheneha, and Kissimmee, and on the east side of the Kissimmee River, and about 35 miles south of this place, the nearest shipping point.

At the present time they have our county surveyor engaged in running lines and staking it off into 40-acre lots for sale to settlers from the North and West. At the same time they are having levels established for a system of irrigation and drainage. The great bulk of these lands is admirably adapted to truck farming and will no doubt be rapidly taken up by actual settlers as soon as transportation facilities become adequate and premanent. The work now being done, and to be done, is with the reasonable expectation that the waterways will be improved so as to give an all-the-year-round channel of 3 feet or more.

As you no doubt have learned by personal inspection, there are hundreds of thousands of acres of similar lands, comprising the Kissimmee Valley, lying ready for the plow when the time comes that its products can be sent to market with reasonable transportation facilities.

Very respectfully, yours,

G. F. KRIBBS,
(Formerly Rep. 28th Pa. Dist. in 52d and 53d Cong.)

Mr. J. M. BRAXTON,
United States Engineer Office, Jacksonville, Fla.

On that condition the people are going down to settle on a stream that is dry eight months out of the year.

Here is a proposition to sell these lands to settlers from the North and West, a real estate proposition, and if this improvement is not made the land can not be sold.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman what is the name of that river? I lost the name.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman will find it in the first paragraph, beginning on line 3, on page 25 of the bill—the Kissimmee River.

Mr. DONOVAN. Did the gentleman say that eight months of the year this stream is dry, with no water in it?

Mr. FREAR. Those are the statistics here in the engineer's report.

Mr. DONOVAN. And this great Committee on Rivers and Harbors has appropriated $47,000 for that river?

Mr. FREAR. That is all—just $47,000.

Mr. DONOVAN. Then the committee is to be commended that it has not made it half a million dollars. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, it is true that there is very little water in portions of that river during several months of the year, but it is also true that there is a great deal of water in it during other months of the year. It is further true that the river runs a part of the way through a lake section, which will furnish plenty of water when this improvement is made. I do not say that it would furnish enough water then to navigate the stream the year around, for I do not think it would. There is a system of improvements, however, in contemplation—not by the engineers, but by private parties; though not contemplated in this improvement—that would use all of the water in those lakes or a sufficient amount of it to make the river navigable from the city of Kissimmee down to Lake Okechobee the year round. That, however, is for the future; but at present the purpose is to give for several months in the year sufficient water to furnish navigation from Kissimmee down to Lake Okechobee. I may say further that when you get into that lake that you can go to Miami on the Atlantic coast through the canals, and through the Caloosahatchee River to the Gulf. There are 71,000 tons of commerce on this river now; but I thought the period of navigation was a little more than four months in the year, as the gentleman says.

Mr. FREAR. I take that from the report.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Assuming that to be correct, if we have 71,000 tons of commerce there for four months in the year, we ought to double that amount of tonnage when we increase the period of navigation to eight months in the year.

Mr. FREAR. A large portion of that is lumber, is it not?

Mr. SPARKMAN. No; there is scarcely any lumber at all in that section of the country. It is largely a prairie country.

Mr. HENSLEY. Is the gentleman from Florida familiar with the conditions there?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Fairly so.

Mr. HENSLEY. Does the gentleman admit that this stream is dry as much as six months of the year?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Oh, no; not dry. The water is too low for navigation several months of the year, but this improvement is expected to remedy that to quite an extent.

Mr. PLATT. Is this improvement going to supply water for the river?

Mr. SPARKMAN. There is plenty of water there, but in places the river will have to be improved if the period of navigation is to be extended, just as we have improved the Ohio and other streams of this country in order to make them navigable or to extend the period of navigation.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Are there any railroads through that country?

Mr. SPARKMAN. No; there is no railroad through that section of the country as yet.

Mr. CALLAWAY. There is nothing to haul through there?

Mr. SPARKMAN. The only means of transportation at present is this river.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Is there nothing in there to haul?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Seventy-one thousand tons were hauled last year on that river, and it would seem there is something there to produce this commerce.

Mr. CALLAWAY. That would be about one trainload, would it not?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Oh, the gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The item just preceding this is in reference to the Oklawaha River. I will ask the gentleman if that is not the most beautiful river in the world?

Mr. COX. Oh, no; the Tombigbee is.

Mr. SPARKMAN. So far as my knowledge extends, excepting two other rivers in my district, I can say it is the most beautiful river in the world.

Mr. MANN. I am prepared to say that that is the most beautiful river I ever heard of, but I would like to ask the gentleman further about the Kissimmee River—whether that is not the sweetest river in the world?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Judging from its name I should say yes.

Mr. BUTLER. When this improvement is made on the Oklawaha River, will it not destroy its beauty?

Mr. SPARKMAN. No. I should think it would add to its beauty, if that is possible.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin to strike out the paragraph.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving channel from Apalachicola River to St. Andrews Bay, Fla.: Completing improvement, $65,000; and the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to pay to the treasurer of Calhoun County, Fla., out of any funds heretofore appropriated for improving channel from Apalachicola River to St. Andrews Bay, the sum of $400 as full compensation for damage done public highways of said county at points where the adopted line of said channel intersects said highways.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order. I would like to have some explanation from the chairman of the committee as to the purpose of including in this bill a private claim for reimbursement of the treasurer of some county down here in Florida.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, this canal crosses one or two highways or county public roads, and cuts them in two where there was no obstruction before, so that it was necessary for the county authorities there to put ferries across this canal or bridge it in some way. Now, it has been customary for Congress to pay just such damages as this.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman cite any instance where a prior river and harbor appropriation act provided for such payment of claims?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Oh, I could not recall the names right now, but it has been my experience in Congress, covering a period of 19 years, that we pay such claims. I have known several of them, and one of them was in Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman kindly mention it?

Mr. SPARKMAN. The Fox River, some one behind me states.

Mr. STAFFORD. I suspect the gentleman behind you, because I happen to come from the State of Wisconsin, desires to make the remark facetiously, but I am not seeking information with that in mind, I am rising for information.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Well, it has been customary, I will say to the gentleman, for Congress to pay just such damages as this. It would not be right, and Congress has heretofore recognized the fact that it would not be right, to go through a county cutting public roads in two and not compensate in some way for the damage done to the county.

Mr. STAFFORD. I should think that the public officials in Florida would be a little more generous than perhaps they are in the Fox River Valley in Wisconsin and would be willing to stand a loss of $400 if they were going to get an improvement that reaches into thousands and thousands of dollars.

Mr. SPARKMAN. As far as that county is concerned, I do not know that the county ever asked for this improvement. It was done in the interest of commerce, in the interest of the people up the Apalachicola River as far as Columbus, Ga., who were asking for a through waterway from the Apalachicola River to St. Andrews Bay. I do not believe the people in this county cared anything about the improvement.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman does not mean to say they are opposing this improvement which involves the expenditure of thousands upon thousands of dollars?

Mr. SPARKMAN. No; they are not opposing the improvement, but I desire to yield to the gentleman from Florida, in whose district this is.

Mr. STAFFORD. I shall be glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WILSON of Florida. I will state to the gentleman from Wisconsin that this canal goes through my district, and, as the chairman of the committee has stated, this canal connects the Apalachicola River and St. Andrew Bay, and goes through the southern part of Calhoun County, and in cutting this canal they crossed two public highways. It then became necessary for the officials of Calhoun County to provide some means of getting across this canal, the burden of which falls upon the taxpayers of Calhoun County. This project of building a canal, of course, will benefit the people of Calhoun County, I assume, but it is not a local matter. It is a general project of carrying out the general scheme of improving inland waterways.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman permit?

Mr. WILSON of Florida. Certainly.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman does not think that $400 will compensate any municipality for cutting two important highways down in Florida?

Mr. WILSON of Florida. Well——

Mr. STAFFORD. That would be $200 apiece.

Mr. WILSON of Florida. I would like to have more for the people of Calhoun County, but they are entitled at least to this.

Mr. STAFFORD. I suppose these are such extremely good highways that you do not feel sufficiently compensated by the improvement. Mr. Chairman, I want to make the point of order against the paragraph authorizing the payment of $400 for compensation to public highways in the State of Florida, lines 15 to 21, page 26, on the ground that it is a claim, and, next, that it is not authorized in this appropriation bill, and, further, that it has not heretofore been authorized by law.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, that principle does not apply to a river and harbor bill. The only question is whether it is germane to the general purposes of the bill. I maintain, Mr. Chairman, that it is germane and absolutely pertinent.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin makes a point of order that it is new legislation on an appropriation bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not lay emphasis on that. I lay emphasis on the fact that it is a private claim on a river and harbor bill.

Mr. SPARKMAN. The fact that it is new legislation—and I do not say that it is—would not make it subject to the point of order, for the rule prohibiting new legislation on an appropriation bill does not apply to a river and harbor bill. The only objection that can be urged to an appropriation on a river and harbor bill is that it is not germane to the main purposes of the bill. If it is germane, as I maintain this is, it is not subject to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the point of order. It is not on the merits.

Mr. WILSON of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I desire to discuss it. This is not a private claim. This is the action of the Government in reimbursing the county of Calhoun on account of having cut through two highways in that county. It is not claimed that it is in the nature of a private claim at all.

Mr. MADDEN. It is a part of the cost of making the waterway.

Mr. WILSON of Florida. It is incidental to the work which the Government has done in building this canal.

Mr. SPARKMAN. It has been held time and again, Mr. Chairman, that the rule as to new legislation does not apply to a river and harbor bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order on the ground that it is new legislation would not be good under——

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not press it on that point, Mr. Chairman. I press it on the point that the Committee on Rivers and Harbors has no authority to report any item relating to damages in this bill that may result by reason of the improvement of rivers and harbors.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is overruled, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Removing the water hyacinth, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Texas: For the removal of the water hyacinth from the navigable waters in the States of Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Texas, so far as it is or may become an obstruction to navigation, $25,000.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I am not doing this to be captious. I want to know of the chairman whether that is the usual provision to put in a bill of this kind, or ever has been put in before?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes; I will say to the gentleman——

Mr. FREAR. I ask for information.

Mr. SPARKMAN (continuing). It is a provision that has been carried in the river and harbor bills now for quite a number of years. It is perhaps a little bit larger now than it has been in the last two or three bills, but not as large, I think, as it had been heretofore. We increased the amount slightly, at the request of the engineers. The original estimate of the engineers, I think, was $20,000.

Mr. FREAR. What is the process by which the Engineer Department determines what amount of time is put upon this? Do they engage in this work alone when they are exhausting this part of the appropriation?

Mr. SPARKMAN. What is the question?

Mr. FREAR. Does the Engineer Department use its machinery for cutting out this water hyacinth alone, or does it do so in connection with other work?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Perhaps in some of the other States they have machinery for it, but not in Florida. It is usually done there by contract work. I know that was done on the Withlacoochee River last year.

Mr. FREAR. Does it kill the weeds, or what is the effect of it?

Mr. SPARKMAN. They have never put in extensive use any plan yet for killing the plant. There are chemical processes by which it can be done, but it was found in practice, when using these chemicals, that it injured live stock. Cattle, for instance, are very fond of this water hyacinth, and feed upon it, but it was found that the cattle died after feeding upon the hyacinths when they had been chemically treated, and complaints came in to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors that injury was being done to stock, and the use of chemicals was stopped, so that now resort is had to other methods.

Mr. FREAR. I notice that no appropriations are made for the destruction of any other weed. I am asking whether that was the only case from which complaint comes. I have in my own mind others that interfere with navigation and interfere with convenience, of course, on other streams.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I do not know of any on southern waters where any other plant interferes seriously with navigation, except the water hyacinth. When it starts it spreads very rapidly, and will often stop the progress of high-power boats.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I will call the attention of the chairman of the committee to this fact: They have about $26,499 on hand now for that purpose, and in no year have they spent more than ten or eleven thousand dollars. For instance, in the year 1910 they spent $11,000. They received no appropriation in 1913; but notwithstanding the appropriation of $30,000 in 1912 they expended only $10,000. In 1913 they had no appropriation, and with the expenditure last year, which was the high-water mark in the expenditure, they still have $26,499 on hand. Now that is surely "carrying coals to Newcastle."

Mr. SPARKMAN. What is the gentleman reading from?

Mr. DONOVAN. From a Government report.

Mr. SPARKMAN. How much does the gentleman say was on hand?

Mr. DONOVAN. Twenty-six thousand four hundred and ninety-nine dollars, and no appropriation was made last year.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, there is not much on hand now.

Mr. DONOVAN. But there was no appropriation last year. The last appropriation was in 1912, for $30,000. They have expended only $10,000.

Mr. SPARKMAN. There was a balance of about $5,000 on the 30th of last June. That is the date referred to in the report that the gentleman is reading from, no doubt. I have not seen it.

Mr. DONOVAN. But the amount on hand will pay for what they have been spending in the past two years.

Mr. SPARKMAN. The engineers say they have been neglecting this work for some time, and that they will likely expend more money in the next year because of a greater necessity for that class of work. They say they will need the money. I do not know whether they will or not, but we were responding to that request, and I believe they will need it. I know that some of the Florida streams need work upon them very badly in that particular.

Mr. DONOVAN. In 1911, let me tell the chairman, they spent only $11,000, and in 1912, $10,000, and with $26,000 on hand you are asking for more.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I doubt the correctness of that.

Mr. DONOVAN. Here is the Government report.

Mr. SPARKMAN. On the Florida projects I will say there was expended last year some $13,000. That was expended on Florida streams. I do not know where the gentleman's figures come from.

Mr. DONOVAN. They expended last year $4,185.

Mr. SPARKMAN. If it embraces Florida, it is not accurate. But be that as it may, the engineers say they will need the amount we are appropriating.

Mr. DONOVAN. It is a report from the Secretary of War.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving inland waterway from Mobile Bay, Ala., to Mississippi River in accordance with the recommendation of the Chief of Engineers made in the report submitted in House Document No. 610, Sixty-third Congress, second session, $100,000: Provided, That no expense shall be incurred by the United States for acquiring any lands required for the purpose of this improvement.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT].

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 28, after line 13, insert the following as an additional paragraph:

"Improving inland waterway from Pensacola Bay to Mobile Bay in accordance with the recommendation of the Chief of Engineers made in the report submitted in House Document No. 610, Sixty-third Congress, second session, $100,000: Provided, That no expense shall be incurred by the United States for acquiring any lands required for the purpose of this improvement."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] reserves a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I will not discuss the point of order now, except to say that if this amendment which I have offered is subject to a point of order the paragraph just preceding it is also subject to a point of order. As I understand it, my amendment properly comes into this bill under the act of March 3, 1909, providing for the building of an inland waterway from St. Georges Sound, Fla., along the Gulf of Mexico, to the Mississippi River.

The only provision in the bill for any inland waterway from St. Georges Sound to the Mississippi River is the one from Mobile Bay to the Mississippi River, which leaves out the proposition between Pensacola Bay and Mobile Bay, and the propositions east to St. Georges Sound in Florida.

The report of the special board upon this proposition between Pensacola Bay and Mobile Bay says on page 27:

The board believes, therefore, that this section is worthy of improvement to the extent of providing a channel 7 feet deep and 75 feet wide on bottom, at an estimated cost of $432,435, and so recommends.

That is the report of the special board of engineers on the proposition which I urge by this amendment.

The report made by the Board of Engineers itself turns down the proposition which I am urging here by way of amendment, and so it turns down also the proposition for an inland waterway from Mobile Bay to the Mississippi River. Both of them stand upon exactly the same footing. I read from the report. Speaking of section 5, which is from Mobile Bay to the Mississippi River, the one included in the bill, the board says:

The Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors concurs in the findings of the special board as outlined above, but recommends for the present time that no further action be taken by the Federal Government.

In regard to the inland waterway from Pensacola Bay to Mobile Bay the board says:

The probability of a considerable commerce through this section of the proposed canal is therefore, in the opinion of the board, not sufficiently encouraging to warrant the expenditure, and it therefore reports that in its opinion the improvement of the inland waterway between Pensacola Bay and Mobile Bay is not advisable at this time.

Now, my proposition is simply this: I have no doubt in the world that an inland waterway along the Gulf of Mexico from St. Georges Sound to the Mississippi River is a good thing, but if it is going to be constructed, each section of that canal ought to be treated fairly, and each section ought to have a sufficient appropriation in order to begin this work.

I do not believe it will be contended for one moment that the amount of appropriation for this channel between Mobile Bay and the Mississippi River will complete it. It is simply the beginning of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I ask that I may be allowed to proceed——

Mr. MADDEN. I am afraid I shall have to object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment will not prevail. Of course, a part of this proposed waterway being in the State which I represent in part upon this floor, it might be expected that I would favor the proposed amendment; and I am not opposed to the improvement later on, but I am opposed to it in this bill. In another bill I should likely favor it.

There are 12 sections of that intercoastal system, from and including the western part of Florida to the Rio Grande in Texas, 3 of which we have adopted in this bill and are appropriating partly for another one. We have taken on the one from Mobile to the Mississippi River, the one from Sabine to Galveston Harbor, and the one from Santiago, Tex., to the Rio Grande. By the way, there is a mistake as to the last-mentioned item, which I will ask a little later on to correct.

Mr. DENT. May I ask why you selected these particular inland waterways instead of the others?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I will tell the gentleman why we did so. The committee selected the one from Mobile to the mouth of the Mississippi River because we thought it important to connect the coal field up above there in the gentleman's State with the Mississippi River, so that the coal could be carried over to the Mississippi, and the freight from that section of country to Mobile and the country below.

Mr. DENT. May I ask the gentleman another question?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Certainly.

Mr. DENT. Does not the report of the special board show that that is exactly the same reason why this canal should go to Pensacola, so that the coal could be carried there?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I want to say that later on no doubt this section of the intercoastal system will be adopted and will appear in some river and harbor bill, but I feel that already we have done all that we ought to do in this bill toward this system; that when we have taken on three of these links here and three on the Atlantic we have done enough for that class of improvement.

Mr. WILSON of Florida. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Certainly.

Mr. WILSON of Florida. I want to ask my colleague, as the gentleman from Alabama did, is it not true that the engineer said practically the same thing about both projects; that is to say, the moving of coal from the coal regions in Alabama down the Tombigbee River; and, before the gentleman answers, I want to ask him further, is it not a fact that Pensacola Harbor is one of the most important harbors south of Newport News, if large vessels do not come in at all times of the year, if dozens of Government gunboats and torpedo boats and even battleships do not come in there, justifying the expenditure?

Mr. SPARKMAN. In answer to the gentleman, I will say that Pensacola is one of the most important harbors on the Gulf of Mexico.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. What is the estimated cost of this?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Three hundred and thirty thousand dollars. That is the estimated cost, while the one in the link from Mobile Bay to the Mississippi River will only cost $227,000. Of course that appealed to the committee, but the main thing was that the committee thought that in their effort to differentiate between the two the one from Mobile to the Mississippi River was relatively of more importance.

Mr. DENT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Certainly.

Mr. DENT. The figures the gentleman names depends upon the depth and width of the canal, do they not?

Mr. SPARKMAN. The width is the same all the way through.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment. The jurisdiction of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors is the improvement of rivers and harbors. This bill comes before the House under clause 56 of Rule XI, making it a privileged bill. The only jurisdiction the committee has in a privileged bill is for the improvement of rivers and harbors, and it has been held on a number of occasions that the committee did not have the privilege of reporting in this bill an item for the construction of a canal. All it has under the rule, under clause 56, is putting in items relating to the improvement of rivers and harbors. The Chair will find, on page 292 of the Manual, this item:

> But a provision relating to a commission to investigate the conditions and uses of waters adjacent to an international boundary line, as well as propositions for the construction of canals and for irrigation, have been held not to be within the jurisdiction of the committee.

On several occasions, when the Committee on Rivers and Harbors has reported an item in the river and harbor bill relating to the construction of a canal, the point of order has been made that even though a bill of that character had been referred to the committee it could not report the item in the river and harbor bill as privileged matter, as all items in that bill must be. Here is an item, an amendment, to create an inland waterway. It is not an improvement of a river, and it is not an improvement of a harbor. The Committee on Rivers and Harbors has no jurisdiction over an item of that kind; the Committee on Canals has jurisdiction over bills relating to the construction of canals. That is what this is. It is a canal. It is called an inland waterway, but it shows that it is not an improvement of either a river or a harbor.

Mr. WILSON of Florida. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. WILSON of Florida. Does not that argument apply to the other three items mentioned by the gentleman from Florida?

Mr. MANN. But the point of order was not made on those items.

Mr. WILSON of Florida. I know that; but I ask the gentleman if he does not, in his opinion, think that it applies to those items?

Mr. MANN. I am frank to say that, so far as my opinion goes, it would apply; but, of course, it is largely a question of fact.

Mr. WILSON of Florida. I do not care to make the point of order myself.

Mr. MANN. It is too late now. As I understand, this is not a poposition to improve a river or a harbor. Of course if it were a proposition to improve a river or a harbor, as a matter of fact calling it an inland waterway would make no difference.

Mr. DENT. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. DENT. Does not the gentleman think that the amendment is proper under the river and harbor act of March 3, 1909, which authorizes the Secretary of War to cause preliminary examination and surveys to be made at different localities, of which this is one, for the purpose of constructing a continuous waterway?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I do not think that makes any difference at all. You might include the canal up here from Pittsburgh to Lake Erie as a part of a continuous waterway, and yet the Committee on Rivers and Harbors has no jurisdiction of the proposition. It is the Committee on Canals. We have had a number of propositions in this House in reference to the enlargement or creation of canals in the State of Ohio. Gen. Kiefer, who was a very valuable Member of this House for years and at one time the Speaker, tried for a number of years to insert in the rivers and harbors bill an item providing for the extension of a canal in Ohio. I thougnt it did not belong in the rivers and harbors bill and I made the point of order on it and it did not get in. This is the same thing precisely.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, whatever force there might be to the argument of the gentleman, if this were a canal it does not apply to the waterway that we are trying to construct here, because it is in no sense, or, if at all, in a very limited sense, a canal. The main purpose of it is to improve intracoastal waterways already existing—deepening the channels here and there.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I have not made a point of order on any item in the bill. I have made a point of order upon the amendment which has been offered. What it may become a part of does not make any difference. The question is, What is it?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, of course, if the point were tenable and should be sustained, it would cut out a great many things in the river and harbor bills that we have been putting in them for many years.

Mr. MANN. That is a question of fact.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to get outside of this particular class of waterways, but, as I said, it is in no sense of the word a canal, in my judgment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it an existing waterway?

Mr. SPARKMAN. It is an existing waterway; but even if it were a canal connecting one navigable waterway with another navigable waterway I should think it would still be within the jurisdiction of the Rivers and Harbors Committee, because it would be for the improvement of rivers and harbors.

The CHAIRMAN. If this proposition were to construct a canal connecting two rivers, would that be germane or admissible on this bill?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ventured that remark, not because I think it is pertinent to the question now before us, but I can foresee that in the future something of the kind might arise. So far, however, as the purposes of this argument and point of order are concerned it is not necessary that the Chair should go to that extent. This is an intracoastal system opening up waterways already in existence, deepening them just as you would deepen a river or harbor. Some of the waterways are in the nature of sounds. It may be that here and there through that stretch of country—I am not sure as to that—we would have to cut through short stretches of land, but I do not know of any on the reach covered by this particular improvement; but I maintain, Mr. Chairman, that the rule does not apply, and the point of order is not tenable when the amendment proposes to improve a waterway like this, where, as I said, the work is intended to improve the navigability of an existing waterway. I think the House will vote the proposition down. I certainly do not want it to prevail, but if it were subject to a point of order and ruled out it would carry with it a great many of the improvements we are accustomed to make in river and harbor appropriation bills.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the gentleman that he ought to give the Chair an opportunity to look into this matter and that he would better rise.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the chairman of the committee that we rise at this time and give the chairman an opportunity to look into this. We have been here long enough, anyway.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I wanted to go on a little while longer. I do not want to keep the committee here all night, but would like to go on a while longer.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman better move to rise and give the chairman an opportunity to look this matter up.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Suppose we pass it by and go on until 6 o'clock.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I will be compelled to suggest the absence of a quorum. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington makes the point of order there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Eighty-three Members are present—not a quorum.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ALEXANDER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 13811, the river and harbor bill, and had directed him to report that it had come to no resolution thereon.

RETURN OF BILL TO THE SENATE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following resolution:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
March 20, 1914.

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate S. 4250, entitled "An act to authorize the county commissioners of Skagit County, Wash., to construct a bridge across Swinomish Slough, opposite the town of La Conner."

Attest:

JAMES M. BAKER, Secretary.
By H. M. ROSE, Assistant Secretary.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. POST. Mr. Speaker, pending the motion to adjourn, I desire to call attention to a statement in the RECORD. On page 5196 there appears a speech of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY], in which he makes the statement that I was paired in favor of free tolls when that question was up before the House. I wish to state that I was not here at that time. We had our primary election in Ohio at that time and I was absent. The statement is not correct, as it would imply that I was present and did not vote.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman was not present?

Mr. POST. I was not here.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the statement in the RECORD will be corrected.

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, Mr. SLAYDEN was granted leave of absence for two days, on account of illness.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they have presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bills and joint resolution:

H. R. 13545. An act to extend the time for constructing a bridge across the Mississippi River at the town site of Sartell, Minn.;

H. R. 10258. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to sell to the city of Lawton, Okla., a tract of land to be used for watershed and water-supply purposes;

H. R. 13365. An act to authorize the construction, maintenance, and operation of a bridge across the Tombigbee River near Old Cotton Gin Port, in Monroe County, Miss.;

H. R. 11331. An act to repeal an act regulating the construction of bridges across the Muskingum River in Ohio;

H. R. 11338. An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and for other purposes;

H. J. Res. 217. Joint resolution to convey the thanks of Congress to the captain of the American steamer Kroonland, of the Red Star Line, and through him to the officers and crew of said steamer, for the prompt and heroic service rendered by them in rescuing 89 lives from the burning steamer Volturno in the North Atlantic Ocean;

H. R. 13091. An act to provide for drainage of Indian allotments of the Five Civilized Tribes;

H. R. 13771. An act extending the provisions of the act of March 3, 1913, authorizing the construction of a bridge over the Missouri River near Weldon Springs Landing, Mo.;

H. R. 11751. An act authorizing the sale of certain land to the county of San Diego, State of California, for public watering purposes; and

H. R. 12594. An act to authorize the county commissioners of Skagit County, Wash., to construct a bridge across Swinomish Slough opposite the town of La Conner.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD three or four paragraphs concerning an early decision relating to freight rates published in the New York American this morning.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD two or three paragraphs from the New York American on the subject of increase of freight rates. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, how long an article is this, and what is the object of inserting it in the RECORD?

Mr. TOWNSEND. It consists of three or four paragraphs.

Mr. MANN. I would like to ask the gentleman from New Jersey why he thinks we ought to commence to insert in the RECORD newspaper articles in regard to an increase of freight rates pending before the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that this sounds like such good news I thought all would like to read it in the morning. It is a very brief summary of many interviews which the correspondent of that newspaper secured here yesterday, and it pleased me so much that I wanted to give the good news as great a circulation as possible, and for that reason I made one of my very few requests for unanimous consent.

Mr. MURDOCK. Which side of this is the gentleman on?

Mr. MANN. I did not ask that question, and I would not in reference to inserting an item in the RECORD, and I hope my friend from Kansas will not.

Mr. MURDOCK. But the gentleman from New Jersey said he was pleased; which side was he on?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I will say to the gentleman from Kansas I was pleased that the commissioners have decided apparently, according to this reliable authority, to make a reasonable increase in the rates asked for by the roads petitioning the commission.

Mr. MURDOCK. I want to say to the gentleman I think that pleasure will not be unanimous in the country.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I hope the gentleman will not object to my pleasure in having this inserted in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The extract is as follows:

"WASHINGTON, March 22.

"The New York American to-day made a canvass of the Interstate Commerce Commissioners who will decide the rate advance by the railroads and found—

"First. The evidence is practically all in, with the exception of a few briefs, and there will be few if any additional hearings.

"Second. The decision will be expedited, and may be looked for in about 40 days—not later than June 1.

"Third. The impression, as gathered from the evidence, of need of increased rates, in whole or in part, is convincing, and the decision will be favorable to the railroads.

"Fourth. The commissioners are keenly alive to the closeness of relationship of prosperity of the railroads with the prosperity of the business and general conditions throughout the country."

ADJOURNMENT.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida moves that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, March 24, 1914, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting draft of a bill to authorize the War Department to enter into an agreement with the Philadelphia, Baltimore & Washington Railroad Co. for the establishment of boundary lines and the relocation of certain rights of way in the vicinity of the Anacostia River, in the District of Columbia (H. Doc. No. 852); to the Committee on the District of Columbia and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication of the Secretary of War, submitting estimates of deficiencies in appropriations required by the War Department for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914 (H. Doc. No. 853); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication of the Secretary of War, submitting a supplemental and additional estimate of appropriation in the sum of $20,000 for headstones for graves of soldiers, required by the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915 (H. Doc. No. 854); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

4. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication of the Acting Secretary of Commerce submitting an estimate of appropriation in the sum of $3,000 for completing the establishment of a light and fog-signal station on the coast of Kauai Island, Hawaii (H. Doc. No. 855); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. CLARK of Florida, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 12291) to increase the limit of cost for the extension, remodeling, and improvement of the Pensacola (Fla.) post office and courthouse, and for other purposes, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 434), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

Mr. POU, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 14685) to satisfy certain claims against the Government arising under the Navy Department, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 435), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 14684) for the relief of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 436), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. DIES, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 10007) for the relief of A. J. Hodges, T. W. Hodges, and C. C. Hodges, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 437), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. MOTT, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 10122) to credit Samuel M. SENATE.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we come before Thee believing that Thou art, and that Thou art a rewarder of them that diligently seek Thee. Our fathers found Thee in the councils of state, on the battle field, and in the quiet pursuits of peace. Thy law stands guard over the rights of men. Thy providence has refined the manners of the people. Thy Holy Spirit has breathed within us the hope of life eternal.

In the Senate we desire to achieve the ideals of Christian life in civil government. We confess our national and individual sins before Thee. We pray Thee to forgive all, and give to us the continuance of Thy guidance, that we may yet attain unto the highest ideals of life in this great land of ours. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, I send to the clerks' desk and ask to have read a telegram from the New Orleans Association of Commerce.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

[Telegram.]

NEW ORLEANS, LA., March 23, 1914.

Hon. JAMES A. O'GORMAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The New Orleans Association of Commerce, the largest commercial organization in the South, is strongly opposed to the repeal of canal toll exemption for American coastwise vessels. We believe we voice the sentiment of the thinking people of the Gulf coast ports in this matter. We fail to see how the repeal of this clause would in any way benefit foreign shipping. We also fail to see how the retention of this clause could in any way harm foreign shipping, due to the fact that it involves coastwise or domestic commerce only, and in which foreign shipping is debarred from competing. In any event, we think that not sufficient stress has been laid upon this essential distinction: American ships passing through the canal and trading in foreign ports will pay the same tolls as ships of foreign nations with which they compete. While we have every proper respect for the opinion and wishes of the President of the United States, we differ with him vitally in this matter. New Orleans is deeply concerned in the rehabilitation of the American merchant marine, and we feel that this unnecessary repeal, if put into effect, would deal a staggering blow to American aspirations for a return to maritime importance. We hope that the fight you and your associates are waging against the attempted repeal will be successful, and desire to have our protest recorded in Congress. Senator JOSEPH E. RANSDELL, of this State, is familiar with this organization and our attitude on this question, as Representative and Senator elect ROBERT F. BROUSSARD and other members of the Louisiana delegation in the Senate and in the House.

M. B. TREZEVANT,
General Manager New Orleans Association of Commerce.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The telegram will be referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I send to the clerks' desk and ask to have read a telegram from Mr. John T. Rehill, editor of the White Plains Daily Argus, of the State of New York.

The Secretary read as follows:

[Telegram.]

WHITE PLAINS, N. Y., March 23, 1914.

Senator O'GORMAN,
Washington, D. C.:

Stand by your guns. Eleven millions of Americans voted for a ratification of a free Panama Canal to American coastwise vessels. American money paid for a right of way through which to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans to bring closer our coast lines, and American money to the extent of $400,000,000 paid for this American waterway, generously agreeing that the canal thus created should be open to the ships of commerce and of war of all nations on terms of equality according to rules as prescribed by the United States and discriminating against no nation according to international law. In providing for an exemption from tolls of American coastwise vessels for the honor of our Nation let no American elected on such a platform reverse himself now. Arnold was a traitor to American arms. Let no American prove himself to be a traitor now to American diplomacy. English statesmen in contending that we are wrong now in our construction of treaty rights stand self-confessed before the world that they deliberately planned by the art of phraseology to rob a generous, friendly nation of the inherent exclusive rights accorded it by international law to trade among its own people without being mulcted. A nation thus self-indicted can well be watched.

JOHN T. REHILL,
Editor White Plains Daily Argus.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The telegram will be referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I send to the clerks' desk and ask to have read a telegram from the San Francisco Chamber of Commerce.

The Secretary read as follows:

[Telegram.]

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., March 13, 1914.

Hon. JAMES A. O'GORMAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

San Francisco Chamber of Commerce desires to express to you its high appreciation of your consistent stand in favor of free tolls through Panama Canal to American vessels engaged in coastwise commerce, and to extend to you its hearty congratulations upon your very clear and convincing expressions in support of this measure.

SAN FRANCISCO CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.
C. F. MICHAELS, President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The telegram will be referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

Mr. O'GORMAN. On the evening of March 20 of this year a meeting of the citizens of the city of New York took place. The meeting was addressed by distinguished citizens, representing the Republican, the Progressive, and the Democratic Parties. I send to the clerks' desk the resolutions read and adopted at that meeting.

The VICE PRESIDENT. What action does the Senator desire?

Mr. O'GORMAN. I ask to have the resolutions read and then referred to the appropriate committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that the resolutions were put in the RECORD yesterday.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Then I ask to have them merely referred at this time to the appropriate committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolutions will be referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I send to the clerks' desk and ask to have read a letter from Mr. William H. Burnett, a citizen of West New Brighton, N. Y.

The Secretary read as follows:

WEST NEW BRIGHTON, STATEN ISLAND, March 17, 1914.

Hon. JAMES A. O'GORMAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I wish to enter with you my protest against the repeal of the present Panama Canal bill, and urge on you to vote against it and use your best endeavors with other representatives of the people to do likewise.

As you doubtless are aware, for years there has been an agitation for some kind of protection for American shipping on the broad Atlantic, but we have never succeeded. The Panama Canal bill, as it reads to-day, would be some aid to American shipping, but throw the doors of the canal wide open, and it places us right where we are to-day, if not worse.

We boast and brag of our power, our ability, and our wealth, and yet we are the weakest Nation on the earth that floats the water.

Go up and down, if you will, the North and East Rivers in Manhattan, and you will find the flags of every nation on the topmast, outside of our coastwise steamers. Now, change your location to any port in the world, as a seaport, and will you find the American flag floating on the topmast? From my experience in my travels I can answer no. Now, why should this be? Here we sit idly by, year after year, and allow foreigners to build ships and carry our commerce in their bottoms, with the appalling result that to-day we are not carrying over 2 per cent of our own commerce in our own bottoms, where, as a matter of right and justice to the American people, we should be carrying 100 per cent. What do we care about England? Why should we cater to England or any other nation? We spent our money in millions to build this canal, and then in order to save the feelings of other nations let England predominate.

It is now your bounden duty, as our representative, to stand for the people against the repeal of this law, and from the sentiments that I learn exist among your constituents and constituents of other localities, if their representatives stand for this, Mr. Wilson's bill, they will not be doing what their constituents want.

Now, let me see, when it goes to a vote, that your vote will be recorded against it.

Yours, very truly,

W. H. BURNETT.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The communication will be referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I send to the clerks' desk and ask to have read a communication from the Sergeant Hamilton Fish Camp, United Spanish War Veterans, of the State of New York.

The Secretary read as follows:

HEADQUARTERS SERGEANT HAMILTON FISH CAMP, No. 46,
DEPARTMENT OF NEW YORK,
UNITED SPANISH WAR VETERANS,
New York, March 21, 1914.

To the honorable the CHAIRMAN OF THE INTEROCEANIC CANALS COMMITTEE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

SIR: At a regular muster of this camp held on March 20, it was unanimously resolved that this organization go on record as utterly opposed to the surrender of any of the benefits to our citizens arising out of the construction, ownership, and operation of the Panama Canal, arguing, as we do, that any yielding to an unwise and unwarranted expediency of any of our legitimate rights in that which is undoubtedly our own would far outweigh in ultimate disastrous results any fancied security that may be thought necessary for a temporary, insecure, and insincere protestation of a purchased friendship at a sacrifice of all harmony in our future foreign and domestic relations by those who are opposed to the principle of free tolls in the Panama Canal to our own coastwise shipping within our own waters and along our own coast; and

Whereas the Panama Canal having been built entirely by the United States of America at the sacrifice of its own efforts and resources, we see no reason for, and are unanimously opposed to, any restrictions being imposed upon our coastwise shipping that will deny to them the full enjoyment of our national waterways, to which they are entitled by the exclusive construction, ownership, and operation of this stupendous engineering undertaking; and

Whereas it was never the intention of the signers of the Declaration of Independence or the founders of this Great Republic to permit any interference in our internal affairs, nor has it since been the policy of those who carried forward the work of the fathers or to permit specious argument to lead us astray from the path of right and justice: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we call upon our Representatives in Congress, and particularly your honorable committee, to urge upon all concerned to most emphatically repudiate the intermeddling of unfriendly influences, inimical to the patriotic consideration of the just rights and interests of our citizens, an honorable conception of our country's institutions, and a loyal support and earnest respect for all those things which have ever been dear to the heart of every true American; and be it

Resolved, That rather than yield one iota of the just rights of our country it were better that we abrogate all treaties that would shackle freedom in our internal affairs.

W. R. WHITING, Adjutant.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The communication will be referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

Mr. JAMES. I desire to present a telegram from former Senator N. C. Blanchard, of Louisiana, directed to Senator J. R. THORNTON, and I ask that it may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read it.

The Secretary read as follows:

[Telegram.]

Hon. J. R. THORNTON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Public sentiment in Louisiana overwhelmingly approves your course in standing by the President in matter of repeal of canal-tolls exemption; nine-tenths of people of north and central Louisiana are that way; and we want Postmaster General given free hand in administration of parcel-post law.

N. C. BLANCHARD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The telegram will be referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

JOHN W. CUPP.

Mr. BRISTOW, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 201) for the relief of John W. Cupp, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 370) thereon.

COPYRIGHTS.

Mr. JAMES. From the Committee on Patents, I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 9897) to amend section 12 of the act entitled "An act to amend and consolidate the acts respecting copyrights," approved March 4, 1909, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kentucky asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of House bill No. 9897. Is there objection?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, just one question. I should like to ask the Senator if the bill as reported is the same as the bill passed by the House?

Mr. JAMES. It is just exactly as it was passed by the House. The only change the bill makes in existing law is that, instead of requiring two copies of a proposed copyright to be filed in the Library of Congress, it only requires one copy to be filed.

Mr. SMOOT. That only applies, however, to foreign countries.

Mr. JAMES. That is all; only to foreign countries.

Mr. SMOOT. I hope the bill will pass.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, being a member of the Committee on Patents, I should like to ask the Senator from Kentucky if the bill has been considered by that committee?

Mr. JAMES. I have polled the committee, as I was unable to get a meeting of it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Did the Senator poll me?

Mr. JAMES. At the time I was polling the committee I could not find the Senator, or I should have submitted the bill to him. If he has the slightest objection to it, I will withdraw the request and make the report to-morrow morning.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I can not object to what I do not know anything about. I have had no notice of a committee meeting, and as the bill had not been submitted to me, I was curious to know whether it had been considered by the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The bill (S. 5044) to establish the Legislative Reference Bureau of the Library of Congress was read twice by its title.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask the Senator if it is a report on the bill which he desires to have printed?

Mr. LEA of Tennessee. This is a new bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill and the accompanying papers will be referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee. In connection with the bill I submit a statement prepared by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], giving the purpose of the proposed law. I ask that it may be printed as a document and that it be referred to the Committee on the Library to accompany the bill.

There being no objection, the amendment was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Amend, line 9, after the word "cotton," as follows:

Strike out the balance of said paragraph and in lieu thereof insert: "to comply with the following conditions:

"That such contract must be in writing, plainly stating the terms of such contract and indicating the parties thereto and signed by the party to be charged, by himself or his agent, specify, or in a written memorandum attached thereto show, the number of bales of cotton involved in the contract, the price per pound of middling cotton, hereinafter called the basis grade, at which the cotton is contracted to be bought or sold, the date of the purchase or sale, and the month in which the contract is to be fulfilled or settled, provide that the cotton therein mentioned or dealt with shall be within the grade limits fixed by the Secretary of Agriculture; to wit, within the limits of middling fair and good ordinary, inclusive, on Government standards, and no other grade or grades, and provide that in the settlement of such contract by the actual delivery of the cotton involved therein, where cotton other than the basis grade is delivered, the difference above or below the contract price which the receiver shall pay for such grades shall be determined as hereinafter provided.

"That for the purposes of this paragraph the differences above or below the contract price which the receiver shall pay for grades above or below the basis grade, in the settlement of a contract for the future delivery of cotton, by the actual delivery of the cotton involved therein, shall be determined by the actual commercial differences in value thereof, established by bona fide sales of spot cotton of the same grades, respectively, made in the course of actual trade, upon the sixth business day prior to the settlement of the contract, in the market where the future transaction involved takes place and is consummated; and in the event that there be no bona fide spot market in which spot sales are made from day to day, at or in the place in which such future transaction takes place, then, and in that case, the said differences in value in the spot markets at five places designated by the Secretary of Agriculture, as the said differences were established by the sales of spot cotton of the same grade, respectively, in such five markets upon the sixth business day prior to the settlement of the contract: Provided, That for the purposes of this paragraph such values in the said spot markets be based upon the standards for grades of cotton fixed by the Secretary of Agriculture. That for the purposes of this paragraph the only markets which shall be considered bona fide spot markets shall be such as are designated by the Secretary of Agriculture. That in determining, pursuant to the provisions of this paragraph, what markets are bona fide spot markets, the Secretary of Agriculture is directed to consider only markets in which spot cotton is sold in such volume and under such conditions as customarily to reflect accurately the price of middling cotton and the differences between the prices or values of middling cotton and other grades of cotton for which standards shall have been established by the Secretary of Agriculture.

"That such contract must further provide for even running lots of units of 100 bales of the same grade.

"That such contract must further provide that each bale of cotton tendered for delivery should be separately marked and tagged and the date of its arrival and classification indicated thereon, and that no cotton which has been certified for a longer period than one year can be tendered or delivered.

"Such contract must further provide that no pro forma tender can be made, but actual delivery of classified cotton shall be made on the 1st of the month at the same time that the buyer pays his money.

"Such contract must further provide a limit of the staple tendered from seven-eighths to 1⅛ inches."

After section 1 insert a new section, to be known as section 2, as follows:

"SEC. 2. It shall be the duty of the Secretary of Agriculture to standardize the grades of 'upland' and 'gulf' cottons separately; and such grades as are established for both 'upland' and 'gulf' cottons shall not include cotton below good ordinary or above middling fair. It shall be the duty of the Secretary of Agriculture also to standardize according to grades, stains, and tinges."

Amend by designating present section 2 as section 3.

Insert, after section 3, a new section, to be known as section 4, as follows:

"SEC. 4. That no person whose evidence is deemed material by the officer prosecuting on behalf of the United States shall withhold his testimony because of complicity by him in any violation of this statute, but any such person so required to give evidence as a witness shall be exempt from prosecution in any court of the United States for the particular offense in connection with the prosecution whereof such testimony was given."

Insert, after section 4, a new section, to be known as section 5, as follows:

"SEC. 5. It is hereby declared to be legal for any number of men or corporations to agree to purchase lint cotton and to further stipulate that the same is not to be sold by or through a cotton exchange which is engaged in selling futures."

Amend by designating present section 3 as section 6.

Mr. RANSDELL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 110) to regulate trading in cotton futures and provide for the standardization of "upland" and "gulf" cottons separately, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. MYERS submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $213.63 to pay Royston C. Durnford, United States deputy surveyor for surveys of public land in Montana, for work executed by him and necessary to complete the lines of survey embraced in his contract No. 583, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WARREN submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $50,000 for continuing the work of constructing roads and bridges within the diminished Shoshone or Wind River Reservation in Wyoming, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $391.84 to reimburse Right Rev. N. S. Thomas, Episcopal bishop of Wyoming, for moneys expended in repairs to buildings on the Wind River Reservation, Wyo., intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GORE submitted an amendment authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to remove the restrictions from Indian allottees under the jurisdiction of the Quapaw Agency in Oklahoma whenever necessary to enable the trustees of any school district to acquire a site for a school building not to exceed 5 acres in extent, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

OMNIBUS CLAIMS BILL.

Mr. O'GORMAN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the omnibus claims bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

TRAFFIC IN OPIUM.

Mr. NELSON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 6282) to provide for the registration of, with collectors of internal revenue, and to impose a special tax upon all persons who produce, import, manufacture, compound, deal in, dispense, sell, distribute, or give away opium or coca leaves, their salts, derivatives, or preparations, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

RIVER AND HARBOR IMPROVEMENTS.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I submit the resolution which I send to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution submitted by the Senator from Oregon will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 312) was read, as follows:

Whereas section 5 of the act of August 24, 1912, commonly known as the Panama Canal act, provides that no tolls shall be levied upon vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States, and it is now insisted that said provision should be repealed, because, amongst other things, it is an unwise economic policy to grant tolls to such vessels and is in the nature of a subsidy to such vessels and the owners thereof; and

Whereas it has been the policy of the United States for 100 years or more to expend large sums of money for river and harbor improvement and for the construction and maintenance of canals, over and through which vessels of all kinds have been permitted to pass without the payment of tolls; and

Whereas this policy was expressly declared in section 4 of the river and harbor act of July 5, 1884, in the following terms, to wit:

"SEC. 4. That no tolls or operating charges whatsoever shall be levied or collected upon any vessel or vessels, dredges, or other passing watercraft through any canal or other work for the improvement of navigation belonging to the United States; and for the purpose of preserving and continuing the use and navigation of said canals, rivers, and other public works without interruption, the Secretary of War, upon the application of the chief engineer in charge of said works, is hereby authorized to draw his warrant or requisition from time to time upon the Secretary of the Treasury to pay the actual expenses of operating and keeping said works in repair, which warrants or requisitions shall be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, however, That an itemized statement of said expenses shall accompany the annual report of the Chief of Engineers"; and

Whereas it has been the policy of the United States to remove as far as possible all obstructions to domestic commerce and to use its waterways to this end, and as factors in the regulation of railroads for the benefit of the people of the whole country; and

Whereas it is now proposed by bills introduced in Congress to reverse this policy and to disregard the provisions of the act of July 5, 1884; and

Whereas the United States has expended millions of dollars for the improvement of rivers and harbors and the construction of canals for the purposes aforesaid, and in addition thereto the several States themselves have expended large sums for such purposes, some times in cooperation with the United States and some times to be used upon their own initiative and in their own way; and

Whereas the Panama Canal has cost the United States more than $400,000,000 and is built upon soil which belongs to the United States and forms a part of the United States coast line; and

Whereas if the tolls clause of the Panama Canal act is to be repealed and tolls are to be levied upon vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States the policy of the Government is to be completely reversed and the act of July 5, 1884, eventually repealed and tolls charged upon all the improved waterways and canals of the country, so that there might be uniform system for the use of these utilities; therefore, in anticipation of a possible repeal of the free-tolls clause of the Panama Canal act and of a reversal of the time-honored policy of the United States with reference to river and harbor improvement and canal construction and operation of these Government utilities free of charge to all commerce, and in order to ascertain the facts in reference to these improvements: Be it

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, requested to furnish to the Senate of the United States the following information: First, the amount expended by the United States in river and harbor improvement since the adoption of the Constitution; second, the amounts expended by the United States in the construction of canals covering the same period of time; third, the amounts that the several States have raised to be used in cooperation with the United States; fourth, the names of the rivers which have been improved and the amounts that have been expended on each, the harbors that have been improved, and the amounts that have been expended on each, the canals that have been constructed and improved and the amounts expended on each; fifth, the total commerce in tonnage and in value that passes through said rivers and harbors and canals; sixth, what charges are made for tolls on any thereof, and what amount of tolls would it be necessary to charge on each for the purpose of reimbursing the Government for the expenditures heretofore made and for the maintenance and upkeep thereof; seventh, what classes of vessels, whether domestic or foreign, are permitted to pass through or into each of these rivers and harbors and canals, and what discrimination, if any, is made in favor of domestic shipping; eighth, what amount might be realized by the United States if a reasonable toll were charged on all shipping passing through said rivers and harbors and canals; ninth, what, if any, treaties are in force between the United States and any other foreign power which would prevent the United States from charging tolls against such foreign Governments even in cases where it might be determined to charge a toll on its own vessels passing through such rivers, harbors, and canals; and tenth, what is the present cost per annum to the United States for maintaining and operating said rivers, harbors, and canals?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution, because it only asks for information which I think the War Department can easily furnish.

Mr. THOMAS. I object, Mr. President.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have the floor, if the Senator will excuse me.

Mr. THOMAS. I object, just the same.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator has the right to object, but I have the floor. I think the Senator is a little bit discourteous to me. He has the right to object, but I have the right to the floor, and to maintain it without interruption from him for the purpose of objecting. I expected that there would be some objection to the resolution, Mr. President, but I ask for the information just the same; and if we do not get it at this time there will be a time during the deliberations of the Senate on this and other measures when the information will be forthcoming, or at least that part of it which may be furnished by the War Department or the other departments of the Government. If the Senator insists on his objection, I shall ask that the resolution go over until to-morrow.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I have no desire to be discourteous to my friend, and if he construes my objection, made perhaps somewhat prematurely, in that way, I certainly desire to apologize to him for any discourtesy that he may conceive to have been intended. I object, Mr. President.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I ask that the resolution go over until to-morrow.

Mr. THOMAS. I desire to say, if I may be permitted, that my objection is not due to any desire to cut the Senator off or to prevent the consideration of this matter.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. We can not hear the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS. I said that my objection was not due to any desire to cut the Senator off or to be in the slightest degree discourteous to him, but it is on account of the condition of the calendar for the day.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I ask that the resolution may go over until to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There being objection, the resolution goes over until to-morrow.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Colorado if he has any objection to the Senator from Oregon securing the information called for by the resolution? Was the objection of the Senator directed to the request for the information or to the resolution or to some language in it?

Mr. THOMAS. My objection, Mr. President, was merely to the consideration of the resolution at this time.

HEARINGS BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON THE LIBRARY.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 311), which was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Library, or any subcommittee thereof, be, and hereby is, authorized, during the Sixty-third Congress, to send for persons and papers and to administer oaths and to employ a stenographer, at a cost not exceeding $1 per printed page, to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any matter which may be pending before said committee, the expenses thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate; and that the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, may sit during the sessions of the Senate.

JEWISH IMMIGRANTS.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, in connection with the proposed immigration bill, a committee of the National Jewish Immigration Council was appointed to examine into the question of illiteracy among the Jewish immigrants and its causes. The committee went into the matter thoroughly and prepared the document which I present and which, I think, is a very valuable contribution on the subject. I ask that it may be printed as a Senate document, and suggest that it be referred to the Committee on Printing for action.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The matter will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I desire to give notice that at the proper time I shall move to amend the standing rules of the Senate by adding thereto the following rule, to wit:

Rule —.

When the unfinished business has, by unanimous consent, been temporarily laid aside and thereafter the Senate has, either by unanimous consent or by motion made and carried, proceeded to the consideration of another question, such subsequent action shall not displace the unfinished business although at the time of adjournment the other question may not have been disposed of.

This notice is given in accordance with Rule XL, and the purpose of the proposed rule is to provide that the unfinished business shall not be displaced when temporarily laid aside by unanimous consent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The notice will be entered.

CONSIDERATION OF APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that to-morrow, at some convenient time, I shall ask the Senate to take up for consideration the Army appropriation bill and the Military Academy appropriation bill.

POSTAL SAVINGS DEPOSITORIES.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to take up the bill (H. R. 7967) to amend the act approved June 25, 1910, authorizing a postal savings system. It is a Post Office Department bill, unanimously reported by the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. It simply permits an enlargement of the amount of deposits in postal savings banks to $2,000.

Mr. SMOOT. I think there is some objection to the bill, and I believe it would be well if the Senator would allow it to go over.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then I will not press it. The department requested me to have it considered, if possible.

MINING ON THE PUBLIC DOMAIN.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a motion in the nature of a resolution, coming over from a preceding day. It will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Motion of the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] that the Committee on Mines and Mining be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 4898) to encourage and promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, potassium, and sodium on the public domain, and that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. MYERS. I ask that the motion may go over for the day without prejudice.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the motion will go over without prejudice.

IRRIGATION IN COLORADO.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, on yesterday morning I gave notice that at the conclusion of morning business to-day I should ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 4405, known as the radium bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is of the impression that the notice of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] preceded the notice of the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH. I appreciate that. I was about to request Senators who have given earlier notices to give way, if they would be willing to do so, in order that the radium bill might be taken up and passed.

Mr. THOMAS. I fully appreciate the importance of the matter which the Senator from Montana desires to bring before the Senate, and ordinarily I should be very glad to give way. In view of the fact, however, that in order to accommodate other Senators, I have been compelled to postpone several times the notice which I have inserted in the calendar that I should call up and discuss Senate joint resolution 117, I am quite anxious to finish what I have to say upon the subject at this time. I shall endeavor to use as little as possible of the time of the Senate in view of the importance of the subject.

Mr. WALSH. I appreciate the fact that it would be scarcely courteous for me to insist upon the matter unless the Senator is quite willing to yield. If he does not desire to do so, of course I shall not press the request for the consideration of the radium measure at this time.

Mr. THOMAS. I should prefer to go on.

Mr. WALSH. I believe, however, the fact will be appreciated that it is of the most urgent character.

Mr. THOMAS. I fully realize that, and I sympathize with the desire of the Senator to secure action on the bill as soon as possible. Under the circumstances, however, I prefer to proceed.

Mr. President, the opinion of the Attorney General, instead of concluding this controversy, seems to have stimulated the activities which were behind it. Within six months after its announcement Mr. Olney, as Secretary of State, on the 6th day of May, 1896, in a protocol of that date, signed by himself and the Mexican minister, appointed Col. Mills and Señor Osorno members of the International Boundary Commission, previously organized, and directed them to investigate and report as soon as practicable upon three propositions:

1. The amount of water of the Rio Grande taken by the irrigation canals constructed in the United States of America.
2. The average amount of water in said river, year by year, before the construction of said irrigation canals and since said construction, the present year included.
3. The best and most feasible mode, whether through a dam to be constructed across the Rio Grande near El Paso, Tex., or otherwise, of so regulating the use of the waters of said river as to secure to each country concerned and to its inhabitants their legal and equitable rights and interests in said waters.

The subjects which this commission were required to determine are incompatible with the counsel of the Department of Justice to the Department of State. It is, therefore, somewhat surprising to note that notwithstanding this fact the State Department persisted, and persisted almost immediately in recognizing and pressing the subject to some practical conclusion.

On the 13th day of May of the same year the Department of State addressed a letter to Col. Mills, transmitting copies of this protocol in Spanish and English, one signed by the Mexican minister and the other by the Secretary of State, stating, in substance, that it was the desire of both Governments that the subjects mentioned in the protocol should be prosecuted without unnecessary delay to a completion within the stipulated period of eight months from May 6, 1896. In other words, this commission, intrusted with very important and far-reaching propositions, in the face of the Attorney General's opinion, was urged to complete its duties within eight months from the date of the protocol, and it at once proceeded with the subject in hand.

And it is noticeable that almost immediately after the commission was appointed one Andreas Horcasitas, assuming to represent the claimants of land on the Mexican side of the river who complained of this inquiry, addressed a letter concerning the subject to the Mexican Secretary of Foreign Relations. I shall not read this letter, but the substance of it is a reassertion of the claims which were rejected by the Department of Justice as having no foundation in law or in equity and insisting upon the application to these claims of article 7 of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo. This letter was dated June 22, 1896, and was transmitted by the Mexican Department of Foreign Affairs to the Mexican minister, and by that official to the Department of State. This succeeded the appointment of the commission by something more than one month, and immediately upon the receipt of it activities were renewed in the State Department instead of referring the Mexican minister to the conclusions of the Attorney General.

On the 8th day of August, within a very short time after its receipt by the Secretary of State, the Acting Secretary of State, Mr. Rockhill, inclosed the Horcasitas letter to Col. Anson Mills, with the comment that the Mexican Government considered the petition well founded and suggested that the requested orders to suspend further diversions of waters of the Rio Grande be issued.

On the 29th day of October Col. Mills replied to the Secretary of State. I shall not read the entire communication, although it is what was once termed "mighty interestin' readin'." In it he called attention to the fact that the Rio Grande Dam & Irrigation Co. (Ltd.) was then engaged in the preliminary work of dam construction at Elephant Butte, and concluded his letter as follows:

I have therefore to request that you ask the Secretary of the Interior to withhold action on all these applications for dams and reservoirs on the Rio Grande and its tributaries in New Mexico until you shall have received my further reply to your letter and determine whether or not you submit the petition of the Mexican Government to that department for consideration.

On the 31st day of the same month the Secretary of State addressed a communication to the Secretary of the Interior, based upon the receipt of the letter from Col. Mills, in which he communicates this request and makes it his own. Now, it will be noted that the request which Col. Mills made of the Secretary of State was that the latter should request the Secretary of the Interior to withhold action on all applications for further diversion dams or reservoirs upon the Rio Grande and its tributaries in the Territory of New Mexico; and in a subsequent letter written by Col. Mills, and found in Senate document 229, on page 11, the identical request is repeated. This letter, however, is a much longer one. It is dated the 17th day of November, 1896, and is a further reply to the letter of the Secretary of State to Col. Mills of date August 8.

This letter is too long for insertion in the RECORD, but it contains two paragraphs that are of great interest in connection with the history of this transaction. The first appears on page 12. Referring to the proposed Rio Grande Dam at Elephant Butte he says:

This proposed dam and reservoir is at a location called Elephant Butte, about 125 miles above El Paso, a distance so great that in this arid climate it is utterly impracticable to carry water to this vicinity, and consequently it will be of no benefit to agricultural interests here, notwithstanding the statement in their prospectus that they propose to provide water not only here in Texas but on the Mexican side of the river.

Language could not be more emphatic as to the inefficiency and utter uselessness of a dam and reservoir at Elephant Butte for the purpose of subserving this Mexican controversy. On page 13 Col. Mills renews the suggestion that these papers be referred to the honorable the Secretary of the Interior, with the request that no further grants for reservoirs be made in New Mexico.

On the 30th day of November, after the receipt of this letter, Mr. Olney writes to Secretary Francis, the letter being found in Document No. 154, on page 144, transmitting copies of the letters of Col. Mills to himself. In this letter he emphasizes what Col. Mills had said to him upon these two subjects. I read from page 145 of this same document:

Col. Mills says that the proposed dam and reservoir of the Rio Grande Irrigation & Land Co. (Ltd.) is located about 125 miles above El Paso, and that it will be useless at that distance to furnish water for irrigation in the vicinity of El Paso and below.

Secretary Francis replied to the Secretary of State on the 19th day of December, 1896, the letter being found on page 19 of Document No. 154, and accompanied by a copy of the order which he had made on December 5 in compliance with the request of that official. I will read that order:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, December 5, 1896.

SIR: Your office is hereby directed to suspend action on any and all applications for right of way through public lands for the purpose of irrigation by using the waters of the Rio Grande River, or any of its tributaries, in the State of Colorado or in the Territory of New Mexico until further instructed by this department.

To the COMMISSIONER OF THE GENERAL LAND OFFICE.

In his letter to the Secretary of State he says:

Immediately upon receipt of your communication I addressed to the Commissioner of the General Land Office directions that he suspend all applications for right of way through the public lands for the purposes of irrigation by using the waters of the Rio Grande River, or any of its tributaries, in the State of Colorado or the Territory of New Mexico.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question there. Was there any law at that time authorizing the withdrawal of lands for any purpose save for forest reserves?

Mr. THOMAS. I know of no law which justified the order of December 5, 1896. It was an arbitrary exercise of departmental authority, made without notice, in direct violation of the law, and having nothing to sustain it except the power of the department to enforce it with impunity.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Has that order remained intact to the present time?

Mr. THOMAS. The order has remained intact, and it is now in force, notwithstanding repeated efforts on the part of those interested in the State we represent here to modify the rigors of its application in behalf of bona fide enterprises designed to utilize the floodwaters of the Rio Grande within the State which up to that time had not been appropriated.

Sinister efforts to accomplish by law the same status which this order has created have been made in the interval, through the interposition of bills in Congress, efforts which would have been wholly unnecessary had the order been authorized. I call attention to one of them, found on page 57 of Document No. 154—this is in 1898—being a rider tacked upon a bill to permit a right of way through public lands for tramroads and canals, and for other purposes:

Provided, That nothing in this act or the act approved March 3, 1891, entitled "An act to repeal timber-culture laws, and for other purposes," or the act approved February 26, 1897, entitled "An act to provide for the use and occupation of reservoir rights reserved," shall be so construed as to authorize the appropriation or storage of waters of any stream or river, State, interstate, or international, to which others below have right by prior appropriation, or the obstruction or interference with the navigable capacity of such streams or rivers, and such appropriation or storage, obstruction or interference is hereby prohibited.

Still later another rider was sought to be attached to a measure then pending in Congress, to this effect:

That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to secure in the State of Texas the necessary lands on which to build a dam on the Rio Grande at or near El Paso, in that State. No reservoir for the storage of water shall be built on the said river within the boundaries of the Territory of New Mexico without an act of Congress authorizing the same.

Some of these measures were aimed more directly at New Mexico than at the State of Colorado, doubtless because at the time its government was Territorial in character, and consequently it was unable to protect its interests as the State of Colorado could.

After the receipt of the letter from the Secretary of the Interior, Secretary of State Olney, on the 4th day of January, 1897, communicated its contents to Col. Mills, and, referring to the order of the Secretary of the Interior, he said:

This order was based upon a request made in your letter to this department October 29, 1896, wherein you recommend that the Secretary of the Interior should "withhold action on all these applications for dams and reservoirs on the Rio Grande and its tributaries in New Mexico," and it follows your language.

It does nothing of the sort. It is vastly more comprehensive than the request, in that it included the State of Colorado, which in turn includes that part of the Rio Grande River where its headwaters and nearly all its tributaries in the United States have their origin. So the Secretary of State must either have misread the communication of Col. Mills to him or the communication of the Secretary of the Interior to him in consequence of the first communication. By some sort of literary jugglery the request made by Col. Mills through the medium of the Secretary of State was applied to the waters of the State of Colorado, with the consequence that for nearly 18 years the flood waters of the Rio Grande within that State have been as much debarred from the operation of the laws of the State of Colorado as though that stream were entirely outside of its geographical boundaries.

In this same letter the Secretary of State asks Col. Mills if the Rio Grande River is navigable "as an entirely distinct matter," although within little more than a year before he had the official opinion of the Attorney General of the United States, written at his own request and in response to his own direction, telling him that the river was not navigable, either in law or in fact, for a distance of about 200 miles below the point where it begins to be the boundary of the two countries, at El Paso. He had that opinion at the time. He was familiar with its contents. He knew that it was not navigable either as a distinct matter or otherwise. But he knew also that the question of navigation was essential to Federal jurisdiction of any controversy that might intervene between the international dam scheme and its ultimate consummation, and hence seemed determined to persist until he secured an opinion from somebody somewhere which would serve his ultimate purpose.

It is very clear, therefore, why this peculiar inquiry should have been made of the man more directly interested, if we are to judge by his conduct, than any other person in the United States in the ultimate consummation of this enterprise, and it is equally clear that the Secretary must have known what the reply would be.

Col. Mills answered this letter on January 7—within three days from the time it was written. I do not know that it is necessary to refer to his response at very great length, although the letter itself is replete throughout with interest and is a very important feature of this transaction. He concludes his comments upon the subject by saying that he assumes the river to be navigable for some things; that is to say, for logs and, possibly, other light-floating material. He says—and, Mr. President, it is well to bear in mind what he said in 1888 in this connection, since he here directly contradicts himself:

> This navigability of the Rio Grande has been largely depleted, almost wholly destroyed, by the cutting off of the Rio Grande and its tributaries in Colorado and New Mexico. To which end the cutting off of the waters of the Pecos by present dams has to some extent contributed. * * *
> It follows, therefore, that the further cutting off of the waters in that river would in a slight degree "injuriously affect the navigation of the Rio Grande and the rights of the citizens of Mexico under international law and treaty."

We have here this remarkable situation: The Department of State, having asked for and obtained the opinion of the Department of Justice concerning the navigability of the Rio Grande above El Paso and the opinion being adverse, seeks to be instructed upon the same proposition from another and a most extraordinary source. The Secretary evidently determined to prosecute his inquiries in whatever direction would bring him congenial results.

Hence we are now confronted with an officer of the United States Army instructing or assuming to instruct the Department of State, at the request of the latter, upon a proposition concerning which it had already received the official instructions of the Attorney General of the United States and whose statement seems to have been much more acceptable to the Department of State than the opinion which it had solicited and obtained from the properly constituted source.

Upon the receipt of Col. Mills's assurance that this stream was, in his peculiar view, navigable, the Department of State entered into communication with the Department of War. On the 13th day of January Mr. Olney wrote to Col. Lamont, communicating to him the letter of Col. Mills just received, and reviewed to some extent the history of this transaction. He calls attention to the fact that the Rio Grande Dam & Irrigation Co. is building a dam at Elephant Butte without the consent of the War Department and assuming to operate under authority derived from the Secretary of the Interior. Then he continues:

> As the proposed erection of this dam across the Rio Grande at Elephant Butte has given rise to an important and perplexing international question, I have the honor to inquire whether the parties engaged in this enterprise * * * have obtained from you as Secretary of War the permission required by the act first above quoted.

> In case it should be ascertained as a fact that the Rio Grande Dam & Irrigation Co. * * * are, without the permission required by the act of July 13, 1892—

And which, by the way, relates to navigable waters only—> building or about to build a dam across a navigable river of the United States in a manner that will obstruct or impair the use of that river as a highway for commerce between the United States and a foreign country, or between the States of the Union, I have the honor to request that you will adopt such measures as are most effective to open the river and to keep it open to such navigation.

He then refers to section 10 of the act of September 19, 1890, under which these questions are enforceable in the courts of the United States, and continues:

> To put you in more complete possession of the facts relating to the dam at Elephant Buttes, I inclose copy of the letter of the Secretary of the Interior, dated September 19, 1896, * * * and of the accompanying report of the Assistant Attorney General for the Interior Department.

It is almost incredible that in such an important communication the Secretary of State should have omitted the slightest reference to the opinion of the Attorney General, which he had himself previously solicited and obtained, and which opinion, as I have said, perhaps with too much iteration, completely disposed of every legal question connected with this miserable transaction. But nothing of the kind was done. Indeed, the studied indifference, the ignoring of this great opinion, is the most sinister feature of all the sinister features of this affair from its beginning to its end. It is fair to say that the Department of War can not be assumed to have been acquainted or to have taken judicial notice of the Attorney General's opinion. Indeed, I am inclined to think that if he had known of it he never would have written the letter to the Department of Justice to which I shall shortly refer.

The Secretary of War referred this letter to a board of Army Engineers on the 15th day of January, 1897, which on the 5th day of February following reported substantially against the navigability of the stream above El Paso.

I refer very briefly to page 84 of Document 154. I shall not attempt to do more than state its conclusion. Maj. Ernst, in his report of January 19, 1899, is quoted, and the report ends with the statement that—

> From the above it would appear that at the time of the examination by Maj. Ernst the Rio Grande above El Paso was not considered a navigable stream, but only looked on as a means of irrigation. There is, however, I am informed, "a short period of high water when it is possible to raft or use flatboats in this part of the Rio Grande."

This information has all the earmarks of Gen. Anson Mills, since it is his language as found in another part of the document.

On the 15th day of January—that being the date of the reference by the War Department of the subject matter of the letter of the Secretary of State to the Secretary of War—Gen. Mills also wrote to The Adjutant General, in which letter he says, referring to his previous correspondence with the State Department:

> It has since occurred to me that from my knowledge of the condition, character, and regimen of the Rio Grande I should have added some facts and circumstances surrounding this question that render it unique—> compared with other of our rivers that have had authoritative consideration by any branch of the Government in the matter of navigation.

As it certainly is—

>
> In all previous considerations I dare say that the questions were entirely local; that is to say, that the structures described and forbidden in the act of September 19, 1890, to "obstruct or impair navigation" has (sic) been considered only with reference to the obstruction that the structure itself gives to the passage at the point where erected. * * *
>
> Whatever may be said of the navigability of the Rio Grande at the point where the dam is proposed to be constructed—

This is the Elephant Butte Dam—

> there can be no question as to its navigability for many hundreds of miles upward from its mouth. * * *

A fact which nobody has ever denied and a fact which can not have the slightest, or could not have had the slightest, bearing upon the question in hand if limited to the head of navigation of the river as established by the most irrefragable facts.

> I submit, therefore, whether this case is not so unique as to require, under the spirit of the law, a different and broader consideration, namely, as a river entire from the location of the proposed dam to the Gulf; to determine in fairness whether the proposed dam would "obstruct or impair" a navigable river of the United States. * * *

In other words, Mr. President, it was necessary in order to overcome and destroy the private enterprise that the Government of the United States through its courts should take jurisdiction, and it could only secure jurisdiction by uniquely injecting into the controversy the element of navigability. Hence, the reference to the Department of War; hence, the letters of Mills to Secretary Olney and The Adjutant General; hence, the entire conspiracy—for that is what it was—from February, 1895, on which date full and lawful authority had been given by the Interior Department to the Rio Grande Co. to proceed with its work under the statutes of the United States.

The War Department, through Secretary Lamont, after receiving the engineers' report, assumed that the construction of this dam would constitute an injury to navigation, and in the face both of the report and the opinion of Attorney General Harmon. So upon the 19th day of February Secretary Lamont addressed a letter to the Attorney General, based upon this assumption and asking for an opinion. He says:

> Under what purports to be authority for it to do so, granted in 1895 by the Secretary of the Interior * * * the Rio Grande Dam & Irrigation Co. claims the right to construct a dam across the Rio Grande at Elephant Butte in New Mexico * * * and are about to do it.
> The Secretary of State has requested the Secretary of War to "adopt such measures as are most effective to open the river and to keep it open to such navigation as it is naturally capable of affording for commercial traffic between the States or between any portion of the United States and Mexico."
> Permission to construct the dam has not been given by the Secretary of War nor has he approved or authorized the same. The mouth of the Concho River, which empties into the Rio Grande, is 325 miles below the site of the proposed dam—

And I might say in passing that the river enters from the Mexican side of the stream from the south—> and this river is the first material addition to the Rio Grande's volume of water below that point. From the mouth of the Concho up to El Paso, a distance of 200 miles, the Rio Grande has been demonstrated to be a navigable water and used as such in interstate commerce.

I want to say here, Mr. President, without the slightest fear of contradiction, that it has not only never been demonstrated that such is the fact, but it is matter of common knowledge, extending through the period of 100 years, that the river is not navigable in any respect whatever for a distance of 150 to 200 miles below the site of the city of El Paso. This statement is nothing less than a reflection upon the intelligence of the Secretary. It is difficult to reconcile the assertion with that degree of information concerning such subjects which the head of a great department is supposed to possess. Yet I do not think the misstatement was intentional or deliberate.

> Above El Paso it does not appear to be used now for the purpose of navigation.

How sinister is the expression, "does not appear to be used now for the purpose of navigation"! It never was and never can be so used.

But from El Paso up to and including the site of the proposed dam, and a good many miles beyond that point, it has been used to float logs for commercial and business purposes. * * * And also in this part of the river above El Paso, and including the site of the proposed dam, the conformation of the bed and banks of the river are such as to make navigation, by reason of the deeper and more confined channel, more feasible than at El Paso.

The proposed dam is to be such a one as will check the flow of water in the river at Elephant Butte * * * so that the Rio Grande will be practically destroyed as a stream for many miles below Elephant Butte and its volume of water so diminished as to materially affect its navigability throughout its entire course to the Gulf of Mexico.

Your opinion is therefore requested as to whether, under existing state of the law, there is any way for the United States authorities to prevent the construction of the said dam, and if so, what the remedy is.

The reader will search in vain for the slightest allusion or reference in this letter to the claims of Mexicans for damage resulting from deprivation of water for the purpose of irrigation, which was the original crux of the controversy, or to anything whatever except this matter of navigability, which, as I said, is here assumed, and falsely assumed; in saying which I do not mean to reflect upon the integrity of the late Secretary of War. I have no doubt this letter was written for him, placed before him, signed mechanically, and then sent to the Department of Justice for a reply.

It is not surprising, Mr. President, that the Attorney General paid no attention whatever to this new request. He had already expressed himself upon the subject to another department. No reference was made in this communication to what he had then said, notwithstanding the fact that it involved the same proposition. I say he paid no attention to it. My statement is made entirely upon the absence of anything that I can find in the documentary history of the affair bearing upon the subject. But the administration changed very soon afterwards, and a new Attorney General came into office. Thereupon an opinion was rendered, in response to the note of Secretary Lamont, entirely congenial to the proponents of this scheme, which, instead of controverting, assumed the navigability of the river at Elephant Butte as its basis. That opinion, Mr. President, was rendered on the 24th day of April, 1897, and is reported in volume 21 of the Opinions of the Attorneys General, on page 519. I shall simply ask permission to incorporate it in the RECORD as a part of my remarks, without stopping at present to read it. The opinion was prepared by Mr. Conrad Holmes, Solicitor General, and approved by Joseph McKenna, then Attorney General of the United States. It is significant, among other things, in that no reference whatever is made to the previous opinion of the Department of Justice. It reaches an entirely different conclusion, irreconcilable with that previously rendered by Mr. Harmon, and started the machinery of justice against this private enterprise, whose destruction was designed ab initio by the proponents of this movement to give Mexico the waters of Colorado, and who asserted that it was necessary to get it out of the way before the international dam scheme could be consummated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KENYON in the chair). In the absence of objection, permission to insert the matter referred to will be granted.

The opinion referred to is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE TO THE SECRETARY OF WAR.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, D. C., April 24, 1897.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of April 8, referring to a previous correspondence between the Mexican minister at this capital and the Department of State, with reference to the attempted construction by the Rio Grande Dam & Irrigation Co. of dams across the Rio Grande and to a request made by you February — for an opinion from this department on the question submitted, and you "renew the request for an opinion on the question presented and invite attention to the pressing need of early action by your department."

I regret that compliance with your request for an opinion has been delayed by the resignation of officers of this department since the request was received.

Your letter of February — was as follows:

"Under what purports to be authority for it to do so, granted in 1885 by the Secretary of the Interior under sections 18 to 21, pages 1101 and 1102, volume 26, Statutes at Large, the Rio Grande Dam & Irrigation Co. claims the right to construct a dam across the Rio Grande River at Elephant Butte, in New Mexico, 125 miles above El Paso, and are about to do it.

"The Secretary of State has requested the Secretary of War to 'adopt such measures as are most effective to open the river and to keep it open to such navigation as it is naturally capable of affording for commercial traffic between the States or between any portion of the United States and Mexico.'

"Permission to construct the dam has not been given by the Secretary of War, nor has he approved or authorized the same. The mouth of the Concho River, which empties into the Rio Grande, is 325 miles below the site of the proposed dam, and this river is the first material addition to the Rio Grande's volume of water below that point. From the mouth of the Concho up to El Paso, a distance of 200 miles, the Rio Grande has been demonstrated to be a navigable water, and used as such in interstate commerce, and it has been recognized by Congress to be navigable water at El Paso. Above El Paso it does not appear to be used now for the purpose of navigation. But from El Paso to and including the site of the proposed dam and a good many miles beyond that point it has been used to float logs for commercial and business purposes, and in this part of the river it carries a slightly greater quantity of water than it does at El Paso and for 200 miles below El Paso, the volume of water being decreased on this part of the river above El Paso, and including the site of the proposed dam, the conformation of the bed and banks of the river are such as to make navigation, by reason of the deeper and more confined channel, more feasible than at El Paso.

"The proposed dam is to be such a one as will check the flow of water in the river at Elephant Buttes entirely for a great portion, if not all, of the year and impound it, and also distribute it from that point for purposes of irrigation, so that the Rio Grande will be practically destroyed as a stream for many miles below Elephant Buttes and its volume of water so diminished as to materially affect its navigability throughout its entire course to the Gulf of Mexico.

"Your opinion is therefore requested as to whether, under the existing state of the law, there is any way for the United States authorities to prevent the construction of the said dam, and if so, what the remedy is."

As I understand, the only authority which the Secretary of the Interior possessed is claimed to have been conferred by sections 18 to 21 of the act of March 3, 1891, entitled "An act to repeal timber-culture laws, and for other purposes." The sections referred to, and section 7, provide only for the location and selection of reservoir sites on the public lands of the United States and rights of way for irrigating ditches and canals. There is nothing in the act or its purposes which was intended to affect the control or supervision of the navigable rivers of the country. That, by other and, indeed, later legislation, is put in the Secretary of War.

Section 10 of the river and harbor act approved September 19, 1890 (26 Stat. L., 454), is as follows:

"That the creation of any obstruction, not affirmatively authorized by law, to the navigable capacity of any waters in respect to which the United States has jurisdiction is hereby prohibited. The continuance of any such obstruction, except bridges, piers, docks, and wharves, and similar structures, erected for business purposes, whether heretofore or hereafter created, shall constitute an offense, and each week's continuance of any such obstruction shall be deemed a separate offense. Every person and every corporation which shall be guilty of creating or continuing any such unlawful obstruction in this act mentioned, or who shall violate the provisions of the last four preceding sections of this act, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment (in the case of a neutral person) not exceeding one year, or by both such punishments, in the discretion of the court, the creating or continuing of any unlawful obstruction in this act mentioned may be prevented and such obstruction may be caused to be removed by the injunction of any circuit court exercising jurisdiction in any district in which such obstruction may be threatened or may exist; and proper proceedings in equity to this end may be instituted under the direction of the Attorney General of the United States."

Section 7 of that approved July 13, 1892, is as follows:

"That section 7 of the river and harbor act of September 19, 1890, be amended and reenacted so as to read as follows:

"'SEC. 7. That it shall not be lawful to build any wharf, pier, dolphin, boom, dam, weir, breakwater, bulkhead, jetty, or structure of any kind outside established lines, or in any navigable waters of the United States where no harbor lines are or may be established, without the permission of the Secretary of War, in any port, roadstead, haven, harbor, navigable river, or other waters of the United States, in such manner as shall obstruct or impair navigation, commerce, or anchorage of said waters; and it shall not be lawful hereafter to commence the construction of any bridge, bridge draw, bridge piers and abutments, causeway, or other works over or in any port, road, roadstead, haven, harbor, navigable river, or navigable waters of the United States, under any act of the legislative assembly of any State, until the location and plan of such bridge or other works have been submitted to and approved by the Secretary of War, or to excavate or fill, or in any manner to alter or modify the course, location, condition, or capacity of any port, roadstead, haven, harbor, harbor of refuge, or inclosure within the limits of any breakwater, or of the channel of any navigable water of the United States, unless approved and authorized by the Secretary of War: Provided, That this section shall not apply to any bridge, bridge draw, bridge piers and abutments, the construction of which has been heretofore duly authorized by law, or be so construed as to authorize the construction of any bridge, drawbridge, bridge piers and abutments, or other works under an act of the legislature of any State, over or in any stream, port, roadstead, haven, or harbor, or other navigable water not wholly within the limits of such State.'"

The provisions are very definite and the answer to your inquiry is obvious if the stream be a navigable one. This you assert and I assume it.

You say:

"The proposed dam is to be such a one as will check the flow of water in the river at Elephant Buttes entirely for a great portion, if not all, of the year and impound it; and also distribute it from that point for purposes of irrigation, so that the Rio Grande will be practically destroyed as a stream for many miles below Elephant Buttes, and its volume of water so diminished as to materially affect its navigability throughout its entire course to the Gulf of Mexico."

The purposes of the company do not seem to be ambiguous. In its prospectus (and, by the way, it is a foreign company chartered by England) it proclaims its purposes to be—

1. To create the largest artificial lake in the world.

2. To obtain control of the entire flow of the Rio Grande in southern New Mexico, the only practical means of irrigating what is now considered the finest fruit and wine country in the United States, and by controlling the water to control, to a great extent, the irrigable lands.

3. To compel the owners of irrigable lands in the valley of the Rio Grande to convey one-half of their lands to the company in return for water rights to the other half, and to pay in addition a perpetual water rent of $1.50 per acre for every acre irrigated, or else to purchase water rights at the ruling rate from the company.

4. To supply water to cities and towns for domestic and municipal purposes, and for milling and mechanical power, for which (they say) there is a large and constantly increasing demand.

The answer to your inquiry, therefore, is:

(1) That the Secretary of the Interior had no power under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1891, supra, to grant the rights claimed.

(2) That the remedy of the United States is by injunction under section 10 of the act of September 19, 1890, supra; and that if the dam has been constructed, also by criminal prosecution.

Upon being advised that the obstruction has been or is about to be erected, I shall at once order proper proceedings to be instituted by the United States district attorney under section 10 of the act approved September 19, 1890 (26 Stat. L., 454).

Very respectfully,

HOLMES CONRAD, Solicitor General.

The SECRETARY OF WAR.

Approved:

JOSEPH MCKENNA, Attorney General.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, that opinion is remarkable in another respect, as is the letter which prompted its preparation. There is no reference whatever to the effect of the diversion of water in the States of Colorado and New Mexico from this river upon the navigability of the stream itself—none whatever. But the end desired was now attained. Shortly afterwards, on the 24th day of May, 1897, the United States instituted its suit against the Rio Grande Dam & Navigation Co. in the district court of New Mexico for the proper district, alleging the construction of the dam to be an impediment to navigation, and asking for its abatement, together with a preliminary injunction restraining the continued construction of the dam and the reservoir pending the litigation. The injunction was granted, although I am unable to give the exact date of the writ.

I shall not, Mr. President, occupy the time of the Senate in tracing the history of this litigation at this time. I shall on a future occasion refer to it at some length. Suffice it to say that every court to which the case was taken decided against the contention of the Government and, of course, against the navigability of the stream, including the Supreme Court of the United States, which in the one hundred and seventy-fourth volume decided every contention of the Government adversely, but reversed the case because certain evidence was excluded which was offered by the Government, tending to show the effect of the dam upon the waters of the stream at the point where it was concededly navigable, a great many miles below the Butte. It returned to the Supreme Court after the District Court and the Supreme Court of New Mexico had a second time considered all the evidence that was offered, together with the evidence previously received, and had again decided the case in the same way. It was again sent back because of the failure of the court below to give sufficient time to the Government to prepare its case; in other words, it seems to have been sent back in order to give the representatives of the Government an opportunity to secure testimony favorable to its contention, which, up to that time, with all its great resources it had never been able to obtain.

While the case was pending as the result of this second reversal the Government filed a supplemental bill against the company, in which it asserted that having failed to complete its enterprise for the period of five years, it must, under the statutes, be construed to have forfeited the same, and had therefore ceased to have any rights whatever to the dam and reservoir site. The perpetual injunction previously granted against the company and its great enterprise, whose only sin was conflict with the scheme of Gen. Mills and his Mexican coadjutors, was therefore affirmed. Lawyers interested in it will find the case reported in 215 United States. This final decree was entered against the Rio Grande Dam & Navigation Co. on December 13, 1909, in the very teeth of the fact that the company had been enjoined by the Government of the United States, during all of which time it had been unable to lift a finger in carrying out the enterprise.

It is true that the Supreme Court of the United States found that the total amount of time between the institution of the suit and its final determination in which the injunction was not effective was equivalent to the five-year statutory period, but every man of experience knows that while a suit brought by the Government of the United States against an enterprise of this character is pending, the fact itself is an embargo and an injunction as complete and effective against obtaining capital to carry it on as any injunction or other inhibitory writ of a court of equity could possibly be. The decree was as unjust as the suit. It was founded upon a falsehood, and the decree was consistent with its foundation.

Mr. President, the waging of the suit was with knowledge of its character. Between the time of the bringing of this suit and its first determination by the court below the President of the United States and his Cabinet were fully advised of its purposes, the absence of its equities and the effect of the suit, if successful, upon agricultural conditions in that section of the country.

The present Representative from New Mexico [Mr. FERGUSSON] was at that time a Delegate to the House. On the 1st day of June, 1897, shortly after this suit was brought, Mr. FERGUSSON addressed a letter to the Secretary of State calling attention to every feature of the controversy and inclosing a copy of a letter to him from one J. A. Beaton, at Albuquerque, N. Mex. Now, bear in mind, Mr. President, that this suit was brought by the United States for the purpose of preventing the creation of an impediment to the navigability of the stream. I shall not read more than one extract from it, and then ask to incorporate the letter in my remarks. On page 18 Mr. FERGUSSON says:

I am convinced that the scheme for the construction of an international dam was initiated for speculative purposes by persons who have bought or taken option on lands along the right and left banks in Texas and Mexico immediately below El Paso. The citizens of Mexico owning ditches and small farms in that vicinity are said to have sold them to a syndicate of wealthy men.

I ask to here insert Mr. FERGUSSON's letter:

H. B. FERGUSSON TO THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., June 1, 1897.

SIR: Permit me to call your attention to a matter now pending in your department in which my constituents, the residents of the Territory of New Mexico, have a deep interest.

The Government of Mexico has made complaint from time to time that the waters of the Rio Grande River were being appropriated by the citizens of Colorado and of the Territory of New Mexico for irrigating purposes to such an extent that the citizens of Mexico were not getting their legitimate share. These alleged rights, they claim, are secured to them under the terms of the seventh article of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo of February 2, 1848 (9 Stat., 22); article 1, last clause, of the Gadsden treaty of December 30, 1853 (10 Stat., 1031); article 3 of the convention of November 12, 1884 (24 Stat., 1011); and article 5 of the convention of March 1, 1889 (26 Stat., 1512).

The authorities of the Republic of Mexico have now, through their minister resident here, asked that the United States shall, at its own expense, construct an international dam across the Rio Grande River at, or near, El Paso, Tex., for the purpose of ponding the waters at that point for the use of the citizens of Mexico residing below there on the left bank of the stream. And the Mexican Government proposes that the United States shall bear all the expenses of constructing such dam, because of the alleged damages which they say citizens of the Republic of Mexico have sustained in the past by reason of the excessive use of the water of that river and the consequent loss of their crops from time to time. It may be remarked that these alleged damages are wholly unliquidated; they have never been investigated by any court or by the executive authorities, and I deny that they are just claims or such as can be proven.

I am informed that a tentative draft of a treaty looking to the construction of such a dam has been submitted for your consideration; also that it contemplates the prohibition of irrigating works on the Rio Grande and its tributaries north of El Paso.

In view of the facts that the Rio Grande from its source in Colorado to El Paso lies wholly within the territory of the United States; that north of El Paso it is not navigable at any season of the year; that therefore the use of its waters within these limits is a matter to be determined by the respective legislatures of Colorado and New Mexico, and that the land along its banks can only be made productive for the sustenance of human life by the use of its waters in irrigating, it must be apparent that no effort should be made to deprive our own citizens of the right to use it without the gravest reasons. The claims of the citizens of Mexico can not be asserted under the ordinary law of nations, nor under the comity which usually exists between independent sovereignties. They must find the right which they assert, if any exists, written plainly in the subsisting treaties between the two countries.

I beg to say that in my judgment they have no such treaty rights. The articles and clauses of the treaties and conventions cited by Mr. Romero in asserting the claims of his people will bear no such construction. No part of any of the said treaties or conventions undertakes to deal directly or remotely with the question of the use of the waters of the Rio Grande above the point where it becomes the boundary line between the two countries.

The United States has no occasion for expending a large sum of money to provide water to irrigate the lands of the citizens of the Republic of Mexico. And to do this at the expense and for the oppression of the citizens of the Territory of New Mexico can find no justification in law or equity.

Speaking specially with reference to the Territory of New Mexico, I beg to say that large tracts of land on each side of the Rio Grande, southward from the point where it enters New Mexico from Colorado, are supplied with irrigating ditches, and abundance of water is taken from the river, and this appropriation of its waters is at least as old as any alleged rights of the citizens of Mexico. Of late years the citizens of Colorado have made such extensive use of the water inside their own State that the supply which now passes into New Mexico is entirely inadequate. Crops perish for lack of water, and unless storm waters can be conserved for use that part of the Territory is in danger of returning to its former arid condition. For this we have no remedy, although the persons thus appropriating the waters of the upper Rio Grande to our great detriment are our fellow citizens of the United States.

I shall not, therefore, believe it possible that an attempt will be made by our national authorities to deprive us of the use of such water as now flows into the river from our own watersheds for the benefit of nonresident aliens, nor of the privilege of constructing dams in that natural watercourse to catch the storm waters. If the report of Col. Mills is correct, the proposed international dam can only be made a success for the purpose contemplated by prohibiting any further use of the waters of the river or its tributaries by the people of New Mexico. That would be destructive of large existing interests; would impoverish hundreds of owners of small farms, and forever prevent any progress in that part of the Territory. And thus the lands on the north and south, which have been redeemed and made productive, would again be worthless desert.

I am convinced that the scheme for the construction of an international dam was initiated for speculative purposes by persons who have bought or taken option on lands along the right and left banks in Texas and Mexico immediately below El Paso. The citizens of Mexico owning ditches and small farms in that vicinity are said to have sold them to a syndicate of wealthy men.

In view of the premises, and the vast interests that my people have at stake in this matter, I respectfully protest against any treaty or convention which would directly or ultimately deprive the citizens of New Mexico of the right to use any or all of the water of the Rio Grande River within the geographical limits of the Territory; and should such a treaty or convention come before you for consideration, I most respectfully ask to be heard before any conclusion is reached thereon.

I am, sir, yours, with great respect,

H. B. FERGUSSON,
Delegate in Congress.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., June 22, 1897.

SIR: Permit me to file a copy of a letter just received as addendum to a letter filed with you by me concerning the proposed international dam at El Paso.

Very respectfully, yours,

H. B. FERGUSSON.

Hon. JOHN SHERMAN,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

The letter which Mr. FERGUSSON incloses from Mr. Beaton is most interesting. He says:

DEAR SIR: There is a small matter, in regard to the irrigation question, that does not seem to have received any attention from the press or anyone else, and that is that there is a dam 1 mile above El Paso, just in the rear of the officers' quarters at old Fort Bliss. This dam is said to be over 100 years old, and is built of cement and rock. As C. F. Lummis says of San Miguel Church at Santa Fe, "There is no question as to the antiquity of the site."

There isn't a drop of water, practically, that can pass this dam except by passing over the top. In view of this fact, navigation would appear to be fit only for turnpike sailors.

I am not interested in this matter directly or indirectly, except as is every other citizen of New Mexico, and my excuse for taking up your time is, as stated at the top of this, that no one seems to know of that dam.

Of course, Mr. President, the existence of that dam, constructed a hundred years previous to this time and maintained during the interval, was a complete impediment to the navigability of the stream at a point 114 miles below where the Rio Grande construction was to be located. That was called to the attention of the Secretary.

On the 7th day of August, 1897, one Frank Burke, of Mesilla Park, N. Mex., addressed a letter to the President of the United States upon the same subject. That letter is found in Senate Document No. 229, heretofore referred to, page 195, and as the letter is comparatively short, I am going to read it into the RECORD:

MY DEAR SIR: May I kindly call your attention to the act of one of your Cabinet officers which has caused a great deal of hardship and depressed our local market and kept out $1,000,000 from coming into the United States this year, and thereby keeping out indirectly another $1,000,000 which would naturally have followed the first? We are located on the Rio Grande, 40 miles up, north of El Paso, Tex. We are 4 miles from Las Cruces. Last year, in May, this river was dry for possibly 200 miles in length. The river goes dry nearly every year at El Paso, Tex. The Mexican Government has a rock-and-cement dam across the river at El Paso, Tex., yet the Mexican people are objecting to us poor, drought-stricken United States citizens from building a dam 100 miles up from El Paso and north of Mexico's north line, to store water in times of floods and high water in April. Now, the Mexican people have done just what they claim we ought not to do—that is, build a dam. They claim that we would obstruct navigation. Now, the river goes dry nearly every year, and even in high water a brave man can wade it.

On the 12th day of January, 1898, one Ernest Dale Owen addressed a long letter upon this subject to the President, duplicates of which he sent to the Secretary of State and to the Secretary of the Interior. This letter, Mr. President, is too long for me to read in its entirety. Suffice it to say that it presented to the consideration of the Chief Magistrate of the Union every proposition bearing upon the purposes and physical character of the proposed enterprise and the effect of this Government suit upon it, together with the utter absence of any cause of action inuring to the Government because of the proposed construction. But there are some things in connection with this letter that I do wish to refer to. I read one paragraph from page 196:

The dam proposed to be built—

This is the international dam, which was still in contemplation and was to be constructed at El Paso—will be 60 feet high, covering an area about 15 miles long—

Of course this refers to the reservoir and not to the dam—

and an average, I am told, of about 7 miles wide. The average depth of the water when the dam should be full would be about 30 feet. This storage, then, would have a capacity of nearly 2,000,000 acre-feet of water. One acre-foot of stored water, it is estimated, is sufficient for the irrigation of 1 acre of land in that climate; that is to say, there is required for the service of land about 24 inches of water, 12 inches of which can be relied upon from the flood in season and 12 inches more to be supplied by storage. By practical men who know the situation this is considered as ample. According to this estimate, the proposed storage would be enough to supply 2,000,000 acres of land. By the farthest stretch more than 150,000 acres of irrigable land could not be found in both the El Paso and Juarez Valleys altogether. This storage, then, would be twelve times larger than is necessary. Giving a liberal allowance, and estimating that a reservoir there should be constructed to supply 200,000 acres, it is, even at this calculation, which is more than is necessary from a practical standpoint, ten times as large as is necessary.

On page 198, speaking of the Mesilla Valley, which the private enterprise was intended to subserve, he says:

The Mesilla has been settled, if not as long as the Juarez Valley, perhaps almost as long—at any rate, it has been settled for centuries—and it does seem to an American that an American valley has at least as much right to the American water flowing through the territory as the foreign country of Mexico. If it be the purpose to make a tremendous storage at El Paso in order to monopolize all the water of the Rio Grande, and thereby take up ten times as much as would be necessary, and to forbid the lands farther up the valley from having any whatever, the situation is grossly unjust and is one that is about to be established by our own Government against our own people.

On the question of navigability, this gentleman says:

The claim that the Rio Grande is navigable or that its navigability is impaired below the point where it becomes the boundary between the United States and Mexico is too absurd to be seriously considered for a moment by anybody who has been there. In the torrential season the river would dash to pieces any craft that should be attempted to be floated upon it. In the dry season I have frequently walked across the bed of the Rio Grande dry-shod. At greater portions of the year—for instance, at El Paso—the river is but a few inches deep. But, further, Mexico has herself constructed at the head of her main ditch supplying the Juarez Valley, nearly opposite the point where the Government station known as Old Fort Bliss used to be located, a diverting wier or dam which, without anything else whatever, would be a complete obstruction to navigation. Mexico, then, is in no position to say that enough water must be left in the river for navigation, even if this were otherwise possible, when she herself has erected a barrier that would make this impossible. This of itself would be a violation of the treaty upon the part of Mexico if the river were navigable. The diversion of the water by this weir built by the Mexican Government is quite as much a diversion of the water that would prevent navigation below as if it were taken out by any other system of dams built by Americans.

Now, Mr. President, notwithstanding the fact that the Government and its chief officials were abundantly informed, I do not discover that any reply whatever was made to these communications. The suit proceeded. The Government, as I have stated, was insistent upon the interference of this proposed enterprise with the navigability of the stream. The then Attorney General, Mr. Griggs, wrote a letter upon the subject to the Secretary of State on the 15th day of March, 1900—Senate Document No. 154, pages 70 and 71. The concluding paragraph of that letter is as follows:

I would point out to you, however, that the sole basis of jurisdiction in the Federal courts, so far as the United States Government is concerned, is interference with the navigable capacity of the stream. The use of the waters of the river for purposes of irrigation is not a use connected with the regulation of commerce, and the act under which the present suit is being maintained against the Rio Grande Dam & Irrigation (sic) Co. is one solely for the protection of commerce.

Mr. President, how could this suit in the slightest degree have protected commerce in any of its features? The navigability of a stream is one thing, and the question whether it is really used for that purpose, or rather for commercial purposes because of its navigability, is entirely another. It is history, Mr. President, that the Rio Grande River, even at places where it is navigable, has not been used for the purposes of commerce, except perhaps in the most limited and local degree, for 50 or 60 years past. The pretense given by the act of 1890—for it is a pretense whenever it is used as it was used by the Government in cases of this kind—that the navigability of the stream is equivalent to its actual use for commercial purposes by the people of the United States is an abuse of authority designed to subserve a beneficent purpose. Instead of being brought for the promotion or the protection of commerce, this suit was brought to destroy a legitimate enterprise in order to promote another enterprise whose history is a shameful and humiliating chapter in American diplomacy.

Shortly after Attorney General Griggs wrote this letter, the Government, in February, 1901, proposed an adjustment of this suit, which it pretended to have brought for the protection and promotion of commerce. The Government representatives made this proposition:

Government representatives in conference agree Government abandon action, and official sanction and protection to be extended to company, provided the company consents to undertake construction of sufficient structures to furnish residents of El Paso and Juarez with a fair proportion of waters without discrimination in favor of New Mexico. Discrimination to be prevented by means of commissioners to be appointed by Government. Company's rights to be guaranteed by new treaty between United States and Mexico or by act of Congress. If declined, suit will be continued, and the Government will carry to Supreme Court, Washington. If accepted, suit must be postponed pending completion of arrangements and Government ratification. Advise as to the course to be pursued.

The company rejected the proposition, which was a flagrant negation of every pretense upon which the suit was based and was being prosecuted, and which also was in direct conflict with Gen. Mills's previously reiterated statement that the erection of the dam and the creation of the reservoir at Elephant Butte, 114 miles away, would be absolutely useless to subserve the purposes intended to be subserved by the proposed creation of the international dam upon the border.

It will be noted that in this proposal not one word was said about navigation. That miserable subterfuge never had the slightest thing to support it from the time it entered into this controversy until it finally succeeded in establishing the purposes for which it was invoked. The Government's contention always was that the dam location at Elephant Butte was unsuitable for the international purposes pretended to be subserved.

I come now to what occurred pending this suit and before its final determination, merely observing that immediately after it was finally disposed of the same people, the same interests, the same Government that had been contending all the time that the Elephant Butte Dam was an obstruction to the navigation of the river, began the preparations for the construction of the so-called international dam at that identical place. It is remarkable that a dam constructed by private enterprise should be an obstruction to navigation, while the same dam constructed by governmental enterprise should not obstruct or interfere with such navigation.

On the 27th day of June, 1904, the Secretary of State, Mr. Hay, suggested that "a solution of the problem of water distribution to those dependent upon the waters of the Rio Grande could be found under the terms of the reclamation act of 1902." Here enters another of the many peculiar features of this transaction. This suggestion of the Secretary of State is referred to in Document 39 of the House of Representatives, Sixty-second Congress, page 13; and it would be a most interesting query, if we could follow it successfully, to ascertain who inspired the Secretary of State to make any such suggestion. But it is equally interesting to note that the Reclamation Bureau promptly responded, and in its third annual report, pages 396 to 426, recommends this as a reclamation project.

Let me refer now to the reclamation act of 1902 for a moment, in order to state just what its purposes were.

In the arid West are great tracts of land which can be made fruitful only by impounding the floodwaters of the country and using them for that purpose. The expense of impounding is prohibitive to private enterprise in many instances, but quite within the power of a great Government like ours. The project of reclamation, therefore, was a most interesting and important one for a number of years before it finally crystallized into the act of 1902. Through the efforts of my colleague [Mr. SHAFROTH], Mr. MONDELL, of Wyoming, and Representative (now Senator) NEWLANDS, of Nevada, a plan was finally formulated which found acceptance and became the law. Under that plan it was provided that the Government, from the proceeds of the sale of public lands in the respective States where the public domain was located, should carry on these works of reclamation, and the lands which were to be reclaimed were to be sold by the Government in small tracts of 40 or 60 acres or thereabouts, and the owners of these lands should reimburse the reclamation fund by paying certain percentages of the purchase price running through a series of years, the fund therefore being practically a loan of the Government to these enterprises, and to be reimbursed by the enterprises themselves. Of course, that presupposes the application of this doctrine to the public domain—not to lands in Mexico and Texas, not to lands in private ownership, but to the public domain of the United States—and as such it became one of the most popular of all of the policies of Mr. Roosevelt's administration.

To apply the purpose of and the appropriation for such an enterprise to an affair partly international and partly private is at least, upon the face of it, extraordinary. That it should have occurred to anyone, and especially so intelligent a statesman as Mr. Hay, is somewhat remarkable. It is the more remarkable in that the private end of the project was designed to supply water to lands in the State of Texas as well as in the Territory of New Mexico, when every schoolboy knows that there never was an acre of public land in Texas at any time, except, of course, the land which belonged to the State, and which might in that sense be called public land. What I mean is that the United States Government never had title to a foot of territory in Texas except as it owns sites for public buildings, fortifications, Army posts, and so forth.

At this interesting period in the progress of this matter the State of Texas appeared. I presume it was embraced in the scheme for local and also for political reasons upon the theory that the success of the scheme required the cooperation of that State. On the 25th day of February, 1905, Congress enacted a law entitled—

An act relating to the construction of a dam and reservoir on the Rio Grande, in New Mexico, for the impounding of the flood waters of said river for the purposes of irrigation.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the provisions of the reclamation act approved June 17, 1902, shall be extended for the purposes of this act to the portion of the State of Texas bordering upon the Rio Grande which can be irrigated from a dam to be constructed near Engle, in the Territory of New Mexico, on the Rio Grande, to store the flood waters of that river, and if there shall be ascertained to be sufficient land in New Mexico and in Texas which can be supplied with the stored water at a cost which shall render the project feasible and return to the reclamation fund the cost of the enterprise, then the Secretary of the Interior may proceed with the work of constructing a dam on the Rio Grande as part of the general system of irrigation, should all other conditions as regards feasibility be found satisfactory.

It will be noted that this statute confines its operation to a very small section of the State of Texas.

Here is a statute which perverts the purpose of and misappropriates the funds provided by the reclamation act for the purpose of carrying out its terms and provisions. Under the terms of that act money received by the Government from the sale of public lands in Colorado must be used there. It could not be used for reclamation purposes in the State of Wyoming or the State of New Mexico, and vice versa; yet here is an act which takes the whole fund, if necessary, and devotes it to the reclamation of land owned either by the State of Texas or by citizens of the State of Texas or by others in fee. The statute concerning this matter was changed in 1900 so as to conform with this new situation.

Afterwards, and on the 12th day of June, 1906, the statute of February, 1905, was supplemented by still another, which provides:

That the provisions of the act entitled "An act appropriating the receipts from the sale and disposal of public lands in certain States and Territories to the construction of irrigation works for the reclamation of arid lands," approved June 17, 1902, be, and the same are hereby, extended so as to include and apply to the State of Texas.

No discretion is left to the Secretary of the Interior by this last statute, but the reclamation act is made bodily to apply to the great State of Texas throughout its entire domain, doubtless because it was a necessary condition to the consummation of this scheme.

On June 30, 1908, as appears in Thirty-fourth Statutes at Large, page 1357, Congress appropriated $1,000,000 out of the general fund—

Toward the construction of a dam for storing and delivering 60,000 acre-feet of water annually in the bed of the Rio Grande at the point where the headworks of the Acequia Madre now exist, above the city of Juarez, Mexico, as provided by a convention between the United States and Mexico, proclaimed January 16, 1907, * * * to be available as needed and to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior in connection with the irrigation project on the Rio Grande: Provided, That the balance of the cost of said irrigation project over and above the amount herein appropriated shall be allotted by the Secretary of the Interior, as may be needed and as may be available from time to time, from the reclamation fund and collected from the settlers and owners of the land benefited under the provisions of the reclamation act approved June 17, 1902, and acts supplemental thereto or amendatory thereof.

That appropriation is all that I have been able to discover out of the general fund toward this enterprise. I shall come to its cost later; but it is significant that this treaty was ratified very shortly after the Texas statutes were enacted.

On the 23d day of May, 1910, the Secretary of the Interior, in his report upon this project, says:

If the Engle Dam proposition were one in which only the citizens of this country were interested, I would not feel justified at this time in taking any action looking to its construction from moneys in the reclamation fund if by so doing the completion of other projects would thereby be delayed. But said dam occupies a different status than the other approved projects, in that it is one in which the citizens of the Republic of Mexico are interested, and the faith of this Government is pledged by solemn treaty to begin and complete it at as early a date as possible. To carry out the provisions of the treaty Congress, by act of March 4, 1907 (34 Stat. L., 1357), made a direct appropriation of $1,000,000 and at the same time provided "that the balance of the cost of said irrigation project" be paid "from the reclamation fund." In view, therefore, of our treaty obligations with the Republic of Mexico and of the said act of Congress, I feel that it is incumbent upon this department to construct said dam as soon as possible, even though the completion of other projects be delayed thereby. I therefore direct you to advise the engineers "to so plan the work as to be ready to begin upon the foundations in July, 1911."

Mr. President, if this means anything it means that this Engle Dam proposition is foreign to and entirely outside of the spirit and letter of the reclamation project; that the Secretary of the Interior is so poorly impressed with its nature that he would not consent to the diversion of these moneys for its construction if it were not for the fact that we are obliged to furnish waters to Mexico by the terms of a solemn treaty obligation conceived in sin and brought forth in iniquity, which never should have been negotiated, and which this Government should abrogate as soon as it can decently do so.

To carry out the provisions of that treaty only the Secretary feels impelled to divert this water and expend these millions, notwithstanding the fact that it interferes with the completion of other and vastly important projects.

Mr. President, that is one of the explanations of the widespread disaffection in the West with the manner in which the Government has administered and constructed these beneficent projects. I could name scores of men and women in my State who have taken their little claims under these unfinished reclamation projects, and who have waited and waited in vain for the performance of governmental promises as to the time when water should be furnished, and with which the Government has been unable to comply because of the diversion of millions of the reclamation fund to the construction and completion of this dam, to the end that 25,000 acres of land in Mexico may be supplied with water at the expense of the Government of the United States in settlement and satisfaction of claims which the Department of Justice has formally declared never had any existence even in morals, to say nothing of equity or international law.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. THOMAS. I do.

Mr. WEST. Does the Senator mean to say that the Government has constructed these dams and supplies the water to Mexico without Mexico paying any part of the expense?

Mr. THOMAS. I do. If the Senator had been present yesterday, he would have heard a discussion of that situation.

Mr. WEST. I was out on committee work.

Mr. THOMAS. I understand the Senator was necessarily absent. When my remarks appear in the RECORD, I shall feel honored if the Senator will give his attention to that feature of this discussion. What is more, Mr. President, this action of the Government, and the inclusion of the State of Texas in the reclamation project, and the inhibition upon the people of my State from using the waters of the Rio Grande for lawful purposes of their own, are in direct violation of section 8 of the reclamation act. That section was inserted in the act by an amendment offered by my predecessor, the lamented Senator Henry M. Teller, who from years of experience and abundance of caution felt that it was necessary for the protection of the rights of the people of the western arid States. I will read it.

SEC. 8. That nothing in this act shall be construed as affecting or intended to affect or to in any way interfere with the laws of any State or Territory relating to the control, appropriation, use, or distribution of water used in irrigation, or any vested right acquired thereunder, and the Secretary of the Interior in carrying out the provisions of this act shall proceed in conformity with such laws, and nothing herein shall in any way affect any right of any State or of the Federal Government or of any landowner, appropriator, or user of water in, to, or from any interstate stream or the waters thereof: Provided, That the right to the use of water acquired under the provisions of this act shall be appurtenant to the land irrigated, and beneficial use shall be the basis, the measure, and the limit of the right.

It will surprise no Senator living west of Kansas to say that this section has been a dead letter ever since the enactment of the law containing it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KENYON in the chair). The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 41) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to sell or lease certain public lands to the Republic Coal Co., a corporation.

Mr. MYERS. I will ask the Senator from Colorado for information about how much longer he would like to speak. What further time would he wish to take?

Mr. THOMAS. I shall endeavor, if possible, to get through within an hour. I want to complete what I have to say this afternoon, and certainly I do not wish to impose to any greater extent upon the good nature of the Senate or the patience of any Senator having business that should be transacted.

Mr. MYERS. The Senator would prefer to finish this afternoon rather than to-morrow?

Mr. THOMAS. I would prefer to conclude this afternoon.

Mr. MYERS. Then I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside for the purpose of allowing the Senator from Colorado to finish his speech.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. NELSON. I wish to add to the statement the words "until the Senator from Colorado has finished his speech."

Mr. MYERS. I ask that that be made a part of the request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The request is that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside until the Senator from Colorado completes his remarks. Is there objection?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Do I understand that, automatically, upon the conclusion of the speech of the Senator from Colorado the unfinished business will be next in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the opinion of the present occupant of the chair. The Senator from Colorado will proceed.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, it may be of interest to some Senators to know that in the case of Kansas against Colorado, reported in Two hundred and sixth United States, the Supreme Court of the United States declared almost in terms the invalidity of the reclamation act as applied to the States. It recognized the right of the Government to reclaim its lands through the operation of the statute in the Territories, and that it was beyond the power of the Federal Government to do so in the States. Notwithstanding that opinion—and the law itself is a most beneficent one if properly executed and administered—the department has gone ahead in all respects as though it had never been rendered.

Now, Mr. President, I come to one of the saddest and sorriest features of this story. I have adverted to the fact that the purpose of this law was to reclaim the public land of the United States so as to give the man who has not availed himself or had the opportunity to avail himself of the beneficent purposes and objects of the homestead and other public-land laws the privilege of doing so upon the reclaimed lands of the West.

But this Mexican scheme as finally determined upon reclaims, including the 25,000 acres belonging to Mexico, a total of 185,000 acres only, of which 11,616 acres, plus 1,423 acres entered under the reclamation act, were public lands. In other words, out of the total of 185,000 acres to be reclaimed 13,039 acres are public lands and open to settlement by citizens of the United States. The rest is private property.

Mr. NORRIS. They are in New Mexico.

Mr. THOMAS. The public lands are in New Mexico. Their amount is so insignificant as to be scarcely believable.

I have said, Mr. President, that Mexico's claim to be supplied with water by the United States was a purely artificial one. It was based upon her construction of section 7 of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo. The Attorney General's construction of this section was contrary to that of Mexico. The language of this section is so patently inapplicable that I put it into the RECORD, so that he who runs may read.

The river Gila and the part of the Rio Bravo del Norte lying below the southern boundary of New Mexico being, agreeably to the fifth article, divided in the middle between the two Republics, the navigation of the Gila and of the Bravo below said boundary shall be free and common to the vessels and citizens of both countries; and neither shall, without the consent of the other, construct any work that may impede or interrupt in whole or in part the exercise of this right, not even for the purpose of favoring new methods of navigation. Nor shall any tax or contribution, under any denomination or title, be levied upon vessels or persons navigating the same, or upon any merchandise or effects transported thereon, except in the case of landing upon one of their shores. If for the purpose of making the said rivers navigable or for maintaining them in such state it should be necessary or advantageous to establish any tax or contribution, this shall not be done without the consent of both Governments.

The stipulation contained in the present article shall not impair the territorial rights of either Republic within its established limits.

If the Mexican construction were placed upon this treaty, it would follow that the citizens of the United States could complain of the diversion by the citizens of Mexico of the waters of the tributaries to the Rio Grande having their origin and their limits within the geographic boundaries of that Republic, and certainly Mexico never would and never ought to recognize the existence of such a right or demand against herself or any of her citizens, for if there be one principle of law without exception it is that every sovereignty is supreme and must be supreme within the boundaries of the country subject to its jurisdiction. Being supreme, it is exclusive.

But, Mr. President, another claim which Mexico asserted in support of its contention of injury was that its rights of appropriation were ancient, running back into the centuries, and the more modern appropriations of the people of the United States depleted and destroyed them and equitably created a claim for damages because of such interference. As a matter of fact the rights of the people of New Mexico on the Rio Grande are as old, if indeed they are not older, than those of the citizens of Mexico in the Juarez Valley.

I wish to refer to that matter very briefly if I can find it in Senate Document 154, pages 51 and 59. I will not attempt to do more than refer to the pages. It is a fact that the waters of the Rio Grande were diverted for the purpose of irrigation by the residents of New Mexico in the valleys of that stream within the boundaries of the United States long before there were any diversions at Juarez, and that if the question of seniority of rights is important our position and the consequent contention of the American Government with reference to these equities would have been irresistible.

Independently of this, however, Mr. President, let me say, as I have said perhaps too frequently in this discussion, that under the laws of the United States and the constitution of the State of Colorado the water is ours, ours by good and indefeasible title.

But, Mr. President, as a matter of ordinary common sense every man will recognize the superior benefits which attend the utilization of the water of a stream for land reclamation near its sources instead of transporting it thousands of miles down the line of the stream and there attempting to apply it to that purpose. Said Maj. Powell upon this subject:

> It is an important question of public policy whether to establish water rights to irrigate thousands of acres in the lower regions or to establish the right to irrigate millions of acres above. That is the problem confronting us in the valley of the Rio Grande. * * * Should it be declared that the waters of the upper region must flow to the lower region, it would cut off millions of acres that could be irrigated above to supply a few thousand acres below. So it is necessary for the ultimate development of that country that the people of Colorado be allowed to use the waters of that State and that the people of * * * New Mexico be permitted to use the waters there.

That, Mr. President, is not only common sense, it is wise statesmanship.

Just here, Mr. President, I want once more to enter my protest against the extent to which the Government of the United States has asserted jurisdiction over the streams of the West upon the theory that they are navigable or essential to the navigation of their confluents. There is not a stream within the limits of my State which by the wildest stretch of imagination could be called navigable. The country from which I hail is the land where the great rivers have their feeble beginnings, fed by the everlasting snows of the Rocky Mountains, which are their perennial sources of supply. From that region they flow indifferently toward the Atlantic and the Pacific oceans. They do not become navigable until, having reached away beyond our boundaries, they have joined their own to the waters of other streams. The same is true of New Mexico; it is true of Wyoming, of Utah, and of Nevada.

Notwithstanding that fact, Mr. President, the assertion of jurisdiction by the Department of War over the streams and the control of the waters of that region is becoming general, in consequence of which we have reached the point where an attempt to divert water from the mountain streams for the cultivation of the soil means collision with the Department of War, to say nothing of those of the Interior and of Agriculture. The effect upon Western development can be imagined, perhaps, much better than described, so I shall give an instance to illustrate our status. I have given it once before. It graphically portrays the conditions which, owing to the continued extensions of power by the various departments here over matters with which they should have little or no concern, those who desire to appropriate water for beneficial uses must now encounter.

The Dolores Valley Co. is a bona fide enterprise, having for its purpose the reclamation of 50,000 or 60,000 acres of land in the southwestern section of my State. They derive, or seek to derive, their water supply from the Dolores River, which is a tributary of the Colorado. The Colorado is navigable from its mouth to Yuma, Ariz., and possibly a little beyond. Under the statutes of the United States that country is authorized to survey its right of way for its canals, pipe lines, feeders, and reservoir sites, and to file the plats thereof with the State engineer, upon whose approval they are sent to the Secretary of the Interior, who must approve them; and when so approved, the process is complete, work can begin.

Now, this company's plats and surveys were approved by the State engineer. Its papers were then forwarded to the Interior Department, and reached the Geological Survey, and after waiting some time the agent of the company came to Washington for the purpose of expediting action upon them. He finally succeeded in getting the approval of the Geological Survey, and from thence they went to the Reclamation Bureau, which is charged with the duty of determining whether these diversions might interfere with some of its projects. If so, the plats and specifications would be rejected.

This enterprise safely ran the gantlet of the Reclamation Service, and then it was directed to the Forest Service, presided over by the Department of Agriculture, duly authorized by regulations to try its hand at the project. After some delay the Forest Service also determined favorably to the project and very graciously put its O. K. upon the plats. The company was then informed that inasmuch as the Dolores River was a tributary of the Colorado, and inasmuch as the Colorado was navigable as far as Yuma, this diversion of waters might possibly affect the navigability of the stream; therefore the Department of War must take the papers and determine whether the use of these waters for the purpose of reclaiming a tract of land, worth nothing without them, would in anywise interfere with the progress of flatboats somewhere down on the Colorado River.

The present Secretary of War was surprised at the discovery of the extent of his jurisdiction. He consulted his subordinates, who told him that such was the fact. He gave his instructions immediately to proceed, and favorable action was taken.

Then the Dolores company discovered that, inasmuch as this river was international, flowing in part in the Republic of Mexico and in part in the United States, it was essential that the Department of State, before any diversion of water was finally sanctioned, should set its machinery in motion and ascertain to what extent, if any, the granting of this right to use water 1,000 miles—if we take the meanderings of the stream—away from the Gulf of California might have upon the political relations or treaty obligations between Mexico and the United States.

Mr. President, this story sounds incredible, and yet such is the extent of modern bureaucracy in its application to the waters of our western streams. The average individual with nothing but his power to labor behind him, and his rights as a citizen to sustain him, must shrink from an encounter with such a maze of difficulties. His desire for a farm with needed water rights is apt to ooze away long before he can thread the various mazes or pilot his little craft through the devious currents and cross currents that beset his journey from his appropriation of the water to his right to make practical use of it.

Mr. President, I do not hesitate to brand this treaty scheme as a huge speculative enterprise conceived by greed and fostered by governmental agencies; a scheme the needs of which are out of all proportion to the ends finally accomplished in its name.

The intelligent use of water for purposes of irrigation, the quantity per acre, and kindred subjects are pretty well understood by those familiar with irrigation. I have already called attention to Mr. Owen's letter, who says that 1 acre-foot of water artificially applied plus the 1 foot of annual rainfall are sufficient for all purposes in El Paso and Juarez neighborhoods.

One of the greatest experts, if not the greatest expert, upon this subject is Mr. Elwood Meade, at one time in the Government employ. I have a reference to a statement of his relating to the amount of water required for purposes of irrigation, which I have mislaid, but I am safe in saying that 3 acre-feet to an acre of land is a maximum of quantity everywhere, and much less than that amount generally suffices. But this scheme proposes to divert for 185,000 acres of land an amount of water which when assembled will make the largest artificial lake in the United States, if my information is reliable.

I presume that at the time the scheme was projected the Government appropriation of $1,000,000 was supposed to be practically sufficient to consummate the enterprise. But, Mr. President, that is not a drop in the bucket. Last January I wrote to the Director of the Reclamation Bureau inquiring what the approximate cost of this scheme would be. On the 28th day of January, 1914, he replied as follows:

> DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
> UNITED STATES RECLAMATION SERVICE,
> Washington, D. C., January 28, 1914.
> Hon. C. S. THOMAS,
> United States Senate.
> MY DEAR SENATOR: In reply to your letter of January 17, 1914, with reference to the total cost of Engle Dam and Reservoir project, in New Mexico, the dam at Elephant Butte will probably cost about $5,000,000, and the entire project, including this dam, the main canals, and distribution system, about $10,000,000.
>
> Cordially, yours,
> F. H. NEWELL, Director.

Ten million dollars, Mr. President, is the present estimate of this scheme, primarily designed to keep a treaty obligation requiring us to supply Mexico with 60,000 acre-feet of water per annum throughout all time.

Mr. President, ostensibly this is to reclaim 185,000 acres. At $10,000,000 that is the equivalent of $54 per acre, requiring 2,760,000 acre-feet of water in all, that being the capacity of the reservoir which the Reclamation Bureau says is necessary for the accomplishment of the scheme. I will give the dimensions——

Mr. WEST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. THOMAS. In just a moment. I will read the dimensions of this reservoir into the RECORD from the Ninth Annual Report of the Reclamation Service:

> Area—
>
> That is, the area of the reservoir—
> 41,280 acres; capacity, 2,760,000 acre-feet; length of spillway, not determined; elevation of spillway, 200 feet above stream bed.

I now yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. WEST. What was the consideration moving from the Mexican Government to this Government for the construction of these dams?

Mr. THOMAS. Nothing except an unfounded and impudent claim that the use of the waters from this river by the people of the State of Colorado. through diversion, for beneficial purposes under the laws of the United States and of our State had diminished the flow to such an extent as to deprive certain Mexican farmers across the river at El Paso from the amount of water necessary for the raising of their crops, which the Attorney General of the United States declared to have no substance either under the treaty, under international law, or otherwise.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. THOMAS. I do.

Mr. FALL. I would desire to refrain from interrupting the Senator from Colorado, but I do not think the Senator who just asked a question would catch the exact situation.

The Senator from Colorado has dwelt upon the Mexican end of the proposition. I think he will admit that the people in old Mexico, the people in Texas, those in New Mexico below the proposed Elephant Butte Dam, settled that country over 300 years ago, and that they irrigated more land with the waters of the Rio Grande than were irrigated in any other portion of the United States, including the entire State of Colorado up to two or three years since.

It is not only for the benefit of New Mexico that this project is being constructed, but for the benefit of the people of the Sierra Madre in New Mexico. We thought so much of the necessity of protecting those people and acquiring that country, that in addition to the land secured from Mexico under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo one-half of the Mesilla Valley lying on the south side of the Rio Grande constitutes what is known as the Gadsden Purchase, made in 1854, for which the United States paid to Mexico $10,000,000 more.

Now then, these lands are sought to be irrigated under what is known as the Elephant Butte project, and I shall state the reason for it. I wish merely to place the Senator from Georgia and other Senators right, and I shall not interrupt the Senator any further.

It has been claimed—the fact has not been disputed—that in recent years appropriations made by the State of Colorado of the headwaters of the Rio Grande have deprived the people of New Mexico, who had water rights 300 years old at least, and the people of Mexico, who had water rights dating back to the same period, and the people of Texas, dating back to the same period, of any use of the waters for periods of three years at a time. Therefore the Government, being pressed by Mexico and by the people of New Mexico and by the people of Texas, finally entered upon this irrigation project as one of the reclamation projects authorized by Congress. The Senator referred to the fact that the proposed acreage watered is something over 2,000,000 acre-feet of water.

Mr. THOMAS. Nearly 3,000,000.

Mr. FALL. Under the ordinary allowance of 3 acre-feet per acre during the irrigation season that would irrigate, he says, 600,000 acres. But the Senator of course knows perfectly well the annual evaporation. In Colorado it is not so much as in New Mexico, but at Elephant Butte the annual evaporation in such a lake as would be formed there is never less than 9 feet, and from that to 13 feet.

The Senator further knows that for periods of more than one year at a time not one drop of water runs through the Rio Grande River. I have lived on the banks of the Rio Grande for 28 years, and in the great Mesilla Valley, which I say was the greatest irrigated surface in the United States several years ago, I have seen for periods of three years not one single drop of water in the Rio Grande. Therefore, to do any good at all, the structure must be large enough to furnish water when the floods are not coming down the Rio Grande. The consequence is that the Reclamation Service has thought, and correctly, undoubtedly, that it was necessary to provide storage for much more than the amount of water which would be annually used. Otherwise, years would come when you would have no water at all.

Now, there is no objection upon the part of the people of the Mesilla Valley to the use of the waters in Colorado, but they do want the prior rights recognized. The people below have rights to the use of this water, which the Senator, of course, recognizes; and we are not so far apart. The people of New Mexico, for whom I speak, have no earthly desire to deprive the people of Colorado of any water; we are not asking to take away from them the waters which they took from us; we are not asking them to return to us any portion of the waters which they have already legally appropriated; but the Government has said, "Stop now, and do not appropriate any more waters, because"—theoretically this is the argument of the Government—"you have already ruined the irrigation enterprises below. Now, stop until we can check up and put these people back in statu quo by the construction of a great irrigation enterprise costing $10,000,000. When that is done and it is ascertained how much of the flood waters only"—not of the waters which they have appropriated, but the flood waters—"flowing down that stream are necessary to irrigate those lands which are entitled to water, we will then relieve Colorado, and it can take every drop of the water which it might take." That is the whole problem.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. THOMAS. I simply want to say, before I yield, that that is not the whole problem, and that I must differ toto cœlo with almost everything which has been said upon this subject by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL]. Now I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. WEST. I wish to ask the Senator from New Mexico if the expenditure of this $10,000,000 was for the purpose of compensating the people of New Mexico for the water that has been held back by the dam higher up?

Mr. FALL. Exactly.

Mr. THOMAS. The expenditure of this money compensates nobody. It is designed to enable the United States to carry out the obligations of this disgraceful treaty. The Secretary of the Interior defends his use of the money for this project upon that ground solely. The people of New Mexico are entitled to no compensation for water held back higher up. They never made nor thought of advancing such a claim.

Mr. President, the Mesilla Valley is in the State of New Mexico. The Mesilla Valley had its own water rights. I concede that they were many years old—many hundreds of years old—that they antedate the rights which the Government has finally provided for in old Mexico. I concede that fully; but, Mr. President, I do not concede that the people of Mexico, because the people of Colorado and New Mexico utilize the waters of the streams within their boundaries for the purposes of civilization and cultivation, for growth and progress and settlement, have any claim in international law, under treaty obligations or in equity, upon the people of the United States, speaking through this Government, or upon the people of my State. We could not take, and we never expect to take, any water rights away from the people of our own country. New Mexico is entitled to the use of the waters of her streams, as Colorado is to the use of those within her own boundaries.

What I complain of, Mr. President, is that in this general scheme of Anson Mills the rights of the people of New Mexico, the rights of the people of Colorado, and, indirectly, the rights and interests of the people of the United States were not only ignored but wantonly sacrificed. I shall come to this matter of evaporation and of the losses which are consequent upon it a little later on. The Senator from New Mexico knows more about the conditions down there than I do. He has lived in that valley for a great many years. But there is nothing in the record that I have been able to find which sustains his assertion either that there have been successive drouths down there or that there are more drouths at present than there were 35 or 40 years ago, before any diversions of water above New Mexico were made. Indeed, the treaty of 1889, known as the Banco treaty, negotiated between the United States and the Republic of Mexico, was made necessary because the annual freshets of the river changed the thread of the stream, and consequently the political jurisdiction of the two countries.

But, to proceed, Mr. President, this 2,760,000 acre-feet of water is the equivalent of 15 feet to the acre if you apply it to the lands which are to be reclaimed by the project. In other words, provision is made whereby every acre is given actually—not potentially, but actually—for actual use, and in reserve a mass of water which if placed upon it at one time would submerge it 15 feet below its surface.

Mr. President, if we make a most liberal calculation of 3½ acre-feet of water to the acre as necessary for the purposes of reclamation and cultivation, the same amount of water in my State would, at a cost of but $12.68 per acre, reclaim more than four times the amount that is to be actually reclaimed. If we assume this water to come from Colorado, as this man Mills asserts, the cost to the people of Colorado resulting from these conditions is very difficult to overestimate. The whole thing is a deliberate robbery of the reclamation fund plus a robbery of the people of the State of New Mexico and of the people of the State of Colorado of the effectual use and enjoyment of the flood waters of this great river.

Now, Mr. President, I come to another phase of the situation. The United States Government finally and reluctantly conceded that its proceeding against the Rio Grande Dam & Navigation Co. was a persecution and not a prosecution; that its cause of action was a pretense and its final judgment a great wrong; and so it has agreed to reimburse those who financed the enterprise to the extent of the money invested. I do not know how much that was. The Government is doing those people tardy and elemental justice, but it is an added element to the cost of this huge scheme of speculation. Let us say that it is a million and half or a million dollars, if you please, the sum must be added to the general cost, and when the real truth is known the probabilities are, Mr. President, that it will be very much more than that, to say nothing of the moral loss involved in the acknowledgment that the Government wrongfully and unjustly put the great machinery of its departments in motion to crush a private undertaking organized and prosecuted through strict observance of all its own requirements.

By way of digression, Mr. President, and to illustrate how some of our boundary commissions operate with the people's money, I want to call attention to a special treaty with Mexico in 1910, which is known as the Chamizal treaty. Its purpose was to determine and to settle the title to a banco or island in the current of the Rio Grande River between the cities of El Paso and Juarez, called El Chamizal. It is a sort of no man's land, both countries claiming it, and is immensely valuable. I am not going into the particulars of this treaty, but it is interesting to note that Col. Anson Mills again appears as one of the members of the commission created by this treaty and authorized to carry out its terms and provisions.

In 1911 Congress appropriated $50,000 to pay the expenses of the old International Boundary Commission, and at the same time it appropriated $50,000 for this El Chamizal Commission, both subject to disbursement and control, if I am correctly informed, by Col. Mills.

Let us for a moment inquire how this last fund seems to have been disbursed. An item or two will suffice. I read a letter of May 4, 1911, addressed by the commission to a stenographer living in this city who was employed to do the stenographic work of this international commission, and who seems to have also done the country. It is dated May 4, 1911, and reads as follows:

MAY 4, 1911.

HERMAN PECHIN, Esq.,
Columbian Building, 416 Fifth Street NW., Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I beg to acknowledge your letter of April 29, and to say that your proposition therein made for reporting the Chamizal case is accepted by me as agent of the United States in the above-named arbitration.

This proposition I understand as follows:

Now, I beg the Senate to pay attention—

Upon the understanding that the proceedings will not materially exceed 2 hours a day, on the average, per week—that is, will not materially exceed 12 hours a week—you will report the same and furnish 14 plain copies daily, for $300 per week, compensation to begin on the day set out for the first meeting of the commission, May 15, and to continue as long as your services are required. In addition to this, you are to receive the actual and necessary transportation and subsistence expenses en route of three persons from Washington to El Paso and return.

It is further understood that in case the work should prove to be materially more than 12 hours a week you would receive payment for such extra work upon a folio basis of 60 cents per folio for the 14 copies.

It is also understood that should any other traveling aside from traveling from Washington to El Paso and return be required of you, you will receive actual transportation and subsistence expenses en route for yourself and your assistants.

It is further understood that you will pay all other expenses incurred by your assistants and yourself, such as subsistence while at El Paso or at any other place at which the tribunal may meet, etc.

It is further understood as follows:

1. That in case the trial of the Chamizal case should be, for any reason, materially postponed so that said trial does not begin on May 15 next, or thereabouts, as is now arranged, this contract will not be binding upon either party.

2. That in such event, however, you should be reimbursed for any sum actually expended by you (such, for instance, as transportation) in preparation for meeting the terms of this agreement, in case such an expenditure results in a loss.

3. It is understood to be the expectation on both sides, although not binding agreement, that in case of such postponement we will agree upon similar arrangements as may be deemed equitable for the reporting of the case when it does come to trial.

Finally, it is our understanding that the provisions of this agreement, looking toward a situation which can not be very clearly foreseen at the present moment, are to be interpreted in a reasonable and liberal spirit of mutual accommodation. For instance, it is the understanding that if the hours of the meetings of the tribunal are such as to render it reasonably possible, you will furnish copy on the same day instead of the next morning; and, in like manner, in case the tribunal should unexpectedly hold sessions at such time and at such length as should result in unavoidable delay in getting out the copy, it is understood that this situation will be also met in a spirit of mutual accommodation until adequate arrangements can be made to meet it.

Very truly, yours,

AGENT OF THE UNITED STATES
IN THE CHAMIZAL ARBITRATION.

How is that, Mr. President, for a contract with a stenographer who is to be paid $300 a week and who agrees to work 12 hours in a week? It is greater compensation than is received by the President of the United States for the same length of service.

Mr. President, I read another letter, which is very short, bearing upon this same subject, written shortly afterwards, which is as follows:

INTERNATIONAL BOUNDARY COMMISSION, UNITED STATES AND MEXICO.
[Chamizal arbitration treaty of June 24, 1910. Agency of the United States.]

The attached copy of a letter, dated May 4, 1911, addressed to Mr. Herman H. Pechin, accepting his bid of $300 a week for not exceeding 12 hours' work on the average per week, reporting the proceedings in the Chamizal arbitration case, is in accordance with a memorandum from the Third Assistant Secretary, dated May 3, 1911, a copy of which is also attached, approving the acceptance of Mr. Pechin's bid. This contract was amended verbally on May 16, 1911, at El Paso, Tex., in order that opportunity might be afforded for a revision of the report and in order that the Mexican agency might be furnished with copies both of the first and second revised. In accordance with this amended contract Mr. Pechin was to receive $400 a week for an average of 12 hours' work, the United States to pay $250 thereof and Mexico the remaining $150. This contract thus amended remained in force until June 9, 1911, when by reason of the slackening of the work owing to the cessation of the hearings, the contract was again amended verbally and it was agreed that Mr. Pechin was to receive $200 a week for as long as his services might be thought necessary, all of which was to be paid by the United States.

W. C. DENNIS,
Agent, Chamizal Agency.

OFFICE OF THE THIRD ASSISTANT SECRETARY,
May 8, 1911.

DEAR MR. DENNIS: In conformity with your recommendation, I approve of the $300 per week to cover salaries for Mr. Pechin and his assistants, but $450 seems to me excessive to cover the cost of their transportation to El Paso and return.

C. H.

Mr. President, the Mexican revolution has been productive of some terrible things, but it has not destroyed this contract, which seems to be still in force. Even a revolution can not overthrow it, although nothing can be done toward its performance while the revolution lasts. I have read this to illustrate the prodigal manner in which these commissions, which seem to be intertwined inextricably with each other, dispose of the public funds which are appropriated year by year in order to enable them to sit in their offices here in the city of Washington and pretend to perform Government services in El Paso and elsewhere. I shall in the near future dissect the disbursement of these appropriations more extensively, for waste and prodigality are their characteristic features.

Mr. President, I have made a calculation, which is somewhat superficial perhaps, but which I think is within reasonably conservative bounds, of the direct injury inflicted upon the people of my State through the construction of this project. According to the Mills affidavit the annual evaporation of the water from Engle Lake would be one-fourth of the whole. On general principles, it seems to me, Mr. President, that if you must take 2,760,000 acre-feet of water from Colorado clear down to the Elephant Butte Dam for the purpose of reclaiming 185,000 acres of land and must make allowance for the loss by evaporation of one-fourth of that amount, after it gets there, that fact of itself condemns the scheme. Far better apply that water where, instead of being lost, it can be made of service to human kind. One-fourth of 2,760,000 acre-feet of water is the equivalent of 690,000 acre-feet; the loss from evaporation, mind you, at the reservoir, according to the affidavit of Col. Mills—and I believe it is even greater, according to my friend the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL]—that 690,000 acre-feet, which is absolutely lost, good for nothing to anybody anywhere, would irrigate in Colorado 345,000 acres or 539 square miles of territory, producing annual crops of the value of only $20 an acre, equal to $6,900,000. These 345,000 acres could be divided into 2,156 farms, of 160 acres each, which, at five to a family, would support 10,780 people. The value of this 690,000 acre-feet in Colorado is at least $25 an acre-foot, or $17,250,000 in all. The value of the 350,000 acres of irrigable land when reclaimed at $25 an acre, exclusive of the water rights, would be $8,625,000.

Col. Mills also swears that water distribution in lower New Mexico involves a loss both by seepage and evaporation. The distance from Engle to El Paso, as heretofore stated, is 115 miles, which means that to supply Mexico with 60,000 acre-feet of water annually, and stored 115 miles distant, would require twice that amount, or 120,000 acre-feet to start with.

This lost 60,000 acre-feet, if it were permitted to stay where it belongs and where it is owned, would irrigate 30,000 acres of land, the equivalent of 187 farms of 160 acres each, which would support 935 people; and if this land produced an annual crop worth $20 an acre, there would be an annual income of $600,000. The value of the water would be $750,000, and the value of the land when reclaimed, exclusive of the water rights, as much more.

So that, Mr. President, this treaty, assuming that Colorado water reaches Engle at all, which it does not, imposes upon our State a direct loss of wasted water valued at $17,250,000, with an annual crop loss of $6,900,000; and it deprives 10,780 American citizens of the privilege of acquiring and utilizing 345,000 acres of the public domain which, with water for reclaiming it, is worth $8,625,000. This, Mr. President, might be bearable if the loss resulted in a corresponding benefit anywhere, but not a dollar of this demonstrable loss benefits anybody, either in Mexico or in the United States.

If the Mills estimate of evaporation is correct, and I think it is, it must follow that the waters of the Rio Grande heading in Colorado must all disappear before reaching Elephant Butte, running, if you follow the meanderings of the stream, a thousand miles through an arid region, a thirsty atmosphere, and a porous soil. Why, Mr. President, I can not conceive of a greater monument of human folly than this Elephant Butte Dam, this Engle Dam, as it is now called by way of contradistinction, when all of these elements are considered, both as to its purposes and as to its consequences upon the people of a great section of this Union.

If it be true that the Rio Grande floods, as Col. Mills has sworn was the case, make the river one of navigable dimensions—I think he says as great as the Mississippi—once a year, then there is plenty of flood water in that stream to supply any reservoir or all of the reservoirs that might be constructed either in Mexico or in the United States, or both, and there is no possible occasion for denying to our people the right to use these flood waters upon the lands of our State.

If we assume our right to all this water, Mr. President—and I think I have demonstrated its ownership under the laws of our country—if we assume our right to all of it, and which can be used without detriment to those below, this project inflicts upon us a direct loss equivalent to the value of 2,760,000 acre-feet of water plus the value of the lands, which have no value without it. At 2 feet to the acre, which is plenty in the State of Colorado, this body of water would reclaim 1,380,000 acres of land, and we have the land there for reclamation if we could only use the water.

The water applied, if valued at $20 per acre-foot, which is not 50 per cent of its actual value, amounts to $55,200,000. Water in Colorado, Mr. President, is like gold in Washington; it is the vital element, without which western community life in any of its aspects is impossible; it is the one element essential to the subjugation of that country; it is the one element which has converted that great region from what was known as the Great American Desert to one of the most fruitful domains upon the continent.

One million three hundred and eighty thousand acres of land reclaimed at $20 an acre—and that is a very moderate price—is the equivalent of $27,600,000. There, Mr. President, is a loss, which will become absolute and permanent unless these conditions change, of $82,800,000.

This land would make, divided into 160-acre tracts, 8,265 farms, supporting 41,325 people at 5 to the farm. Their annual production, at $20 an acre, would be $27,600,000. So we see that the direct expense of the Government in constructing this enterprise is not a tithe of the tremendous cost which is imposed upon our people to the end that it may be finally accomplished.

The Government, Mr. President, has no power to take the property of the citizen without making compensation, yet on the 5th day of December, 1896, it laid its interdict upon the people of my State and forbade them the use of any of the flood waters of this great river except those which had been previously appropriated. This action has arrested the growth and development of the great San Luis Valley; it has prevented the reclamation of hundreds of thousands of acres of land which only need the fructifying influence of this stream and its tributaries to become parts of one of the most productive regions of the world.

We have, Mr. President, a short distance above the San Luis Valley, through which this river flows on its way to New Mexico, a natural site for a reservoir that has no superior in America. It is known locally as Wagon Wheel Gap. There the river forces its way through stupendous mountain battlements, scarcely 500 feet from one to the other, a place designed by nature for a great dam, which would create a reservoir holding all of these waters and enabling us to distribute them over hundreds of thousands of acres in the San Luis Valley. The dam site has been located, and a company was formed long ago for the purpose of utilizing it for the prosperity and welfare not only of the State but of the Nation; but the project has been paralyzed for 18 years, to the end that the Government of the United States through a treaty whose history is a scandal and a shame may give to the people of the Republic of Mexico 60,000 miserable acre-feet of water every year for 25,000 acres of land at a cost of $10,000,000, plus the reimbursement of the money expended by the Rio Grande Dam & Irrigation Co., plus this tremendous loss that is inflicted upon the people of my State.

Mr. President, at this time I attack neither the dam nor the treaty. They should be investigated and their sins exposed. If they ever are, our Department of State, our Department of Justice, and the Reclamation Service will find it difficult to reconcile their conduct with the elemental principles of justice and fair dealing, with due regard to the well-being of our own people, or with the ordinary requirements of prudence or business caution. Some of these officials may be required to explain why the Mexican minister received greater credit than the Delegate from New Mexico, and why the opinion of the Attorney General was subordinated to that of a colonel in the Army. And Anson Mills, the Mephisto of this scandalous diplomatic episode, will, it is to be hoped, either vindicate the integrity of his conduct or receive the indignant but merited condemnation of honest men everywhere. But these things in their proper season.

All I now ask is that the State of Colorado may, by the enactment of the joint resolution which I have introduced, be permitted to invoke the machinery of the courts and by proceeding against the Interior Department determine the right of its citizens to use these flood waters; that is all. We either own them or we do not, and by this process we can settle the proposition. I can conceive no grosser act of injustice than that of a great Government which prohibits the people from utilizing these waters and at the same time denies them the right to appeal to its courts for relief. Yet, Mr. President, such is our unfortunate plight. We have tried time and time again, by negotiations with the department and by petition to the President, to test our rights to these waters in the courts of the country. We have tried time and time again to secure a relaxation of this rigid interdict in specific instances, only one or two, as I now recall, having been successful.

We are told that this sacred treaty, solemnly ratified by two great countries, binds the United States to an observance of its terms and requirements, whatever the consequences. That we admit; but we contend, Mr. President, that the waters of this river, which have their source in our State, never reach the point where they are supposed to be impounded; that they disappear in the soil and in the atmosphere long before that point is reached. We answer that the extension of the irrigation area increases and makes more permanent the flow of every stream that is so utilized in the West, and sustain our contention out of the mouths of our opponents. We contend that the sacrifice of our property to the supposed requirements of this treaty is needless and therefore doubly unjust; that the burden we bear lightens that of no other people. We have proved this both actually and historically, but without avail. We then ask whether the property of the people of our State is to be taken without compensation by the Government to which we owe allegiance upon the pretense that it can only thus perform its treaty obligations with another republic; and the sole response is denial of our assertion, without proof to support it. If I have not demonstrated that fact up to this time, however, I certainly despair of ever being able to do so.

Mr. President, this scheme is an unanswerable condemnation of the Reclamation Bureau. I make no reflections upon its integrity of purpose, but I affirm that any department which will deliberately promote a project requiring the transport of 2,760,000 acre-feet of water in a channel meandering for 1,000 miles through a desert country for the purpose of reclaiming 185,000 acres of land lying in part more than a hundred miles above the end of its final journey, should be dismantled and its officials put into a lunatic asylum. It is the most preposterous, the most expensive, the most indefensible enterprise of the sort that this or any other country ever attempted, and its outrageous progress is attended by delay in the completion of reclamation projects throughout the West—in Washington, in Wyoming, in Utah, in Colorado, in Arizona—because the millions of money belonging to the reclamation fund and needed for them are being diverted for the completion of this mad and senseless project.

Mr. President, the people of the San Luis Valley have suffered from these conditions for many years. As I have stated, their protests have gone unheeded. They have had their counsel, among whom are the firm of Hayt, Dawson & Wright, of my city, a most competent firm of attorneys, eminent in ability and extensive in experience in all matters relating to the use of waters for irrigation and other purposes in the West. These gentlemen have endeavored in vain, by conference and consultation with the Secretary of the Interior, with the Commissioner of the Land Office, with the Reclamation Bureau, and with the President of the United States to secure a modification of the edict of 1896, or even the poor boon of an appeal to the courts. In 1912 my colleague [Mr. SHAFROTH] was governor of Colorado. As a last resort he took up the question with the President, who reluctantly proposed to arbitrate the controversy by a board of three engineers, one of whom should be the Chief of the Reclamation Service. Needless to say, Gov. SHAFROTH declined the proposal with thanks.

I have here a copy of a letter addressed by Gov. SHAFROTH to the President of the United States upon this subject, dated August 28, 1912, which gives a very lucid account of the attitude of our State at the time, which I ask permission to insert in the RECORD without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that may be done.

The matter referred to is as follows:

RIO GRANDE WATER RIGHTS.

DENVER, COLO., August 28, 1912.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: In my letter to you of July 24, 1912, I stated that the real gist of the contest between the State of Colorado and the Reclamation Service, to which we invited your personal attention and consideration, was this: None of its (Colorado's) streams being navigable, we claim that the waters thereof are absolutely under the control of the State and its people, subject, possibly, to some equitable apportionment between States, as intimated in the case of Kansas v. Colorado (206 U. S., 46).

We do not understand that this claim is disputed by the Interior Department; but in applying the water to the lands we must pass through some portions of the public domain, and this the Interior Department says we shall not do. In other words, the department is indirectly doing that which it has no power to do directly. We believe that such action is not only unwarranted, but that it is in violation of the explicit language of the eighth paragraph of the reclamation act and against every court decision.

In your letters above referred to the appointment of an advisory committee is suggested, to ascertain the amount of available waters of the Rio Grande, and add:

"It is not proposed that action shall be taken which shall be legally binding either upon the State or the Federal Government."

The plan proposed does not meet with my approval nor with the approval of the citizens of this State. Among other objections to the plan proposed is that, if followed, it would not be final and conclusive and would serve merely to delay any settlement. The citizens of Colorado take one view of the law and the Secretary of the Interior an entirely different view, and any plan that will leave it to the Secretary of the Interior to determine this question should not, in my judgment, be favorably considered.

In connection with the matter of delay, I desire to call attention to the fact that the original order withholding rights of way upon the public lands for the purposes of irrigation, by using the water of the Rio Grande and its tributaries, was made upon December 5, 1896, nearly 16 years since.

This order was based upon a recommendation made by the Secretary of State. The order being so based, the citizens of this State naturally supposed that if they could convince the honorable Secretary of State that the recommendation was not well founded the recommendation would be withdrawn, and with such withdrawal the order of the Secretary of the Interior would fall.

After a full hearing before the Hon. ELIHU ROOT, then Secretary of State, which was had some time in the year 1906, the State Department, upon the 24th day of September, 1906, in a letter to the Interior Department with respect to applications for right of way through public land for the purposes of irrigation, by using the waters of the Rio Grande or any of its tributaries in Colorado or New Mexico, stated in substance that the Department of State perceived no reason for the further suspension of action for any application of such character, and recommended that the order of December 5, 1896, and all modifying orders be rescinded, thus removing, so far as the Department of State is concerned, all restrictions on the consideration of applications involving any enterprise of a character which, on investigation by the Reclamation Service, is found to be not prejudicial to the treaty interests of Mexico.

Notwithstanding this conclusion by the State Department, the original order of the Interior Department, with some modifications, has remained in force until this day. These modifications, in effect, removed all restrictions upon filings made prior to March 1, 1903, and limited rights after that date to reservoirs with a capacity of not exceeding 1,000 acre-feet. Allowing rights of way for reservoirs up to a maximum capacity of 1,000 acre-feet was no better for us than a sweeping order would have been disallowing all rights for reservoirs, as the expense of construction of a small reservoir is prohibitive.

These various orders had this anomalous effect: Those who refrained from filing under the order of December 5, 1896, were without the pale of consideration, while those filings which were made while the original order was in force and before March 1, 1903, passed unchallenged.

Why the date of March 1, 1903, was stated, I am unable to say; but it does seem that if any date was to be fixed it should have been the date of the treaty with Mexico, which did not become effective until the year 1906, and this treaty provides only for furnishing the Republic of Mexico with 60,000 acre-feet per annum, and specifies during what months it shall be delivered.

Late in the year 1906 a committee was appointed by the citizens of the San Luis Valley, in Colorado, to present their grievances to the officers having control in the matter for the Federal Government. A member of this committee thereupon visited Washington, prepared to fully present the matter, but was informed by the officers then in control that no hearing was necessary, for the reason that they had concluded to allow all filings that were then pending. This statement was made by Dr. Wolcott, who is now at the head of the Smithsonian Institute, and by Mr. Newell, who is now Director of the Reclamation Service.

In 1908 Mr. Newell visited the city of Denver in company with the Hon. James A. Garfield, then Secretary of the Interior, and was present when a committee of our citizens met with the Secretary for the purpose of going over the Rio Grande matters. Attention was called to the statement of Mr. Newell referred to, and he was called upon to correct it, if incorrect. He, however, acknowledged the correctness of the statement, but said that circumstances had changed. So far as I am aware, he has never informed any of the parties in interest as to what particular circumstances he referred to.

I think I have said enough to show that the State of Colorado, and particularly the citizens of the San Luis Valley, have already suffered greatly by delays, and if these orders are erroneous and unjust, as contended by us, immediate relief should be had. Therefore, in the belief that it is within your power as President to grant such relief, we have made our appeal directly to you.

The claim presented by the citizens of the San Luis Valley as embodied in the resolutions passed by the Denver Chamber of Commerce is in substance as follows:

"That the action of the Interior Department in refusing to grant rights of way for reservoirs and canals near the headwaters of the Rio Grande in Colorado, as provided by law, is illegal, arbitrary, unjust, etc."

It will be noticed that the resolution is directed to a specific act of the Secretary of the Interior, to wit: The withholding of rights of way; and, in my judgment, to add anything else at this time would only serve to complicate matters and cause further delay.

Speaking of the investigations made by the Federal Government, the honorable the Secretary of the Interior, in his letter of June 25, 1912, to Mr. Thorndike Deland, secretary Denver Chamber of Commerce, says inter alia:

"Considerable investigation has been made in regard to the Rio Grande watershed, and sufficient data have been accumulated to show that large diversions in the San Luis Valley would materially lessen the amount of water available for the Rio Grande project." * * *

Of course, it must be understood that the investigations upon which the Secretary relies were made by the Federal Government without an opportunity by the State of Colorado to participate, and a determination has been reached without giving the State of Colorado or its people an opportunity to be heard.

I notice, however, that Mr. C. E. Siebenthal, who made an investigation of the water supply of the San Luis Valley on the part of the Geological Survey, reached a contrary conclusion to that stated by Secretary Fisher. (See Water Supply Paper 240, entitled Geology and Water Resources of the San Luis Valley, Colo., by C. E. Siebenthal.)

In order to meet the question raised it will require some time in preparation on the part of the State of Colorado, and an appropriation by the State legislature must first be made to defray the expense of such an investigation. It should, however, be distinctly understood that the State of Colorado claims prior right to the use of the waters of the Rio Grande and its tributaries, subject possibly to the obligation of furnishing its proportion of the water to the Federal Government that will enable it to comply with its treaty obligation to furnish the Republic of Mexico with 60,000 acre-feet per year.

Recurring to the question presented by the Denver Chamber of Commerce, to wit, the right of the Secretary to deny rights of way for ditches and reservoirs upon the public domain in the San Luis Valley, it has been suggested that this matter can be better presented to you by a committee from Colorado selected for the purpose, and if it will be agreeable to you to have the matter so presented I would suggest a date be fixed for such hearing during the month of October.

It is hoped that such a hearing will result in demonstrating to you that the action of the Secretary of the Interior is illegal, and for this reason should be rescinded; or, failing in this, that there is at least sufficient doubt in respect to its legality to warrant you in using your great influence in favor of the filing of a test case, submitting the entire matter to the courts for decision. We feel that we are right in our contention notwithstanding the proviso adopted by Congress in 1901.

In conclusion I thank you on behalf of the people of this State for the kindly consideration you have already given this matter. Your desire to "do everything that can properly be done to develop the State of Colorado and the interests of its citizens," is fully appreciated by our people as well as by,

Sincerely, yours, JOHN F. SHAFROTH, Governor.

Hon. WILLIAM H. TAFT,
President, Washington, D. C.

P. S.—We feel, Mr. President, that all that will be necessary to entitle the citizens of the San Luis Valley to their rights is for you personally, as a lawyer, to examine our claims and hear a committee that we are willing to send to Washington to present the matter to you.

JOHN F. SHAFROTH.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I have detained the Senate much longer than I intended upon this subject. I could speak upon it until the close of the session without exhausting it. If any apology is necessary for taking so much time, it must be the stupendous importance of the question to the present and the future of the State which I here in part represent. Its satisfactory solution is vital to our continued growth and progress. It is one the solution of which is indispensable to the expansion of that section of our State which depends for existence upon the waters of the Rio Grande and its tributaries.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Before the Senator retires from the floor, since he has investigated this question so thoroughly, I should like to ask him whether any of the companies that have been preparing to construct reservoirs in the San Luis Valley made their locations and presented their filings to the United States Government before there was ever a filing made by the United States Government itself for the Engle Dam or before the actual beginning of construction of the Engle Dam.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not know that I caught the full import of the question. Will the Senator repeat it?

Mr. SHAFROTH. The situation is simply this: Under the irrigation laws of the State of Colorado in order to initiate a filing and get a right for the construction of a reservoir and a right to the water in the reservoir it becomes necessary to file with the State engineer of the State of Colorado an application and a filing for that purpose. That initiates the right. If the United States Government wants to construct a canal or a reservoir it also is compelled to file with the State engineer such an application and a plat showing the character of the improvement to be made. These applications, according to the law of the State of Colorado, have their rights attach at the time of filing with the State engineer. What I want to know is whether those filings which were made in the State engineer's office of the State of Colorado with regard to any considerable number of reservoirs were prior to the time of beginning the construction of the Engle Dam?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I can only answer that question generally. The most important of them, I think, were. If by the Engle Dam the Senator means the dam which the Government is constructing, they were all prior to the time when the Reclamation Service assumed charge of it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That is what I mean.

Mr. THOMAS. The preliminary work of construction there, I think, began in 1910 or 1911. Some of them, however, were subsequent to the departmental order of December 5, 1896.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes. I take it, however, that in law the departmental order had nothing on earth as a foundation upon which to predicate it.

Mr. THOMAS. Nevertheless it has been absolutely effective.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It has simply been adhered to in violation of law. Now, I wish to ask whether the filings of applications for rights of way on the public domain by these Colorado reservoir companies were before the application of the Government itself or before the beginning of the construction of the Engle Dam?

Mr. THOMAS. I am not advised as to the date of the Government filings; but the construction of the dam itself was begun, I think, in 1910, something like four years ago this coming summer. Practically all of the appropriations of the waters of the Rio Grande in our State preceded the commencement of the construction of that dam and reservoir.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Then, if the United States Government were simply a private individual, it would have no rights whatever against these reservoir companies in the State of Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. Why, Mr. President, my contention is that it has not the rights of a private individual. I find nothing in the statutes which authorizes the Government of the United States, as such, to make an appropriation of water upon the streams in the West. The Government is the proprietor of much of the land out there, but in the Kansas-Colorado case the Supreme Court of the United States denied its right to intervene in that contest. It had based its alleged right to intervene upon its ownership of the running waters in the public domain. The Supreme Court recognized the right of appropriation that has been substituted for the old riparian right at common law, which obtains almost entirely outside of the arid regions of the United States, and held that the United States had no such title to the waters running through the lands of the public domain as would justify that court in permitting it to intervene in that celebrated controversy.

Mr. President, I trust I have said enough to impress those who have done me the honor to listen to me with the magnitude and importance of the subject locally. Certainly in these days no man need argue the proposition that whatever benefits or injures one of our 48 sovereignties also benefits or injures the rest of the United States. If the Government can take the waters of our State for a project like this, then it can enter into similar relations with Mexico concerning the peninsula of Lower California with reference to the waters of the Colorado River, and lay a like inhibition upon the States where the sources of that great river are found. Indeed, the same doctrine can be applied in every direction. It is wrong; it is injurious; and I am amazed that such a treaty should have been ratified by the Senate of the United States composed in part of Senators representing the States of the Union to be so vitally affected by the operations required for the due observance of its covenants.

I ask that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Public Lands, which, I think, is the committee that should give it due consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be so referred.

THE REPUBLIC COAL CO.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 41) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to sell or lease certain public lands to the Republic Coal Co., a corporation.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House bill 9671.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I understood that the unfinished business was temporarily laid aside to be taken up immediately at the conclusion of the remarks made by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. MYERS. That was the agreement and order.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator from Montana that he might ask to have the unfinished business temporarily laid aside for the consideration of the bill referred to by the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, this bill will not take longer than just enough time to read it.

Mr. NELSON. Then it will not displace the joint resolution of the Senator from Montana except to that extent.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to say just a word in relation to taking bills off the calendar. There are a good many Senators who have been waiting here now for nearly a week to get the calendar before the Senate.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am one of them.

Mr. SMOOT. That being the case, I do not think it is right for Senators to ask unanimous consent that certain bills be taken off the calendar and considered by the Senate, because I think all ought to be treated alike. There are a number of bills here in which Senators are deeply interested, and which they would like to have disposed of. I will say to the Senator that if we continue as we are doing now, I believe it will not be many days before we will reach the calendar and dispose of the bills that are now on the calendar.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. BANKHEAD. If the Senator will permit me for just a minute, I will say that this little bill is almost at the foot of the calendar. It is purely a patriotic bill. The object of the bill is to appropriate $5,000 to aid in the erection of a suitable monument on the battle field of the Horseshoe, in Alabama, where the great battle was fought by Andrew Jackson in the Indian war when he wiped out the Indians. The State of Alabama has appropriated $2,500 for the purpose. The people of the State have built a magnificent road from the town to the battle field, 12 miles distant. A patriotic lady, who owns the field, has donated 5 acres of land for the purpose. There will be a meeting on the one hundredth anniversary of that battle next Saturday for the purpose of considering it, and I should like to have this little bill passed.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator if it is a House bill?

Mr. BANKHEAD. It is a House bill.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I wish to know whether the agreement at the time the unfinished business was temporarily laid aside by unanimous consent was that immediately upon the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Colorado the Montana joint resolution should be laid before the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The unfinished business is before the Senate unless it be temporarily laid aside for the purpose of taking up some other measure; and that, as the Chair understands, was the request of the Senator from Alabama—that it might be temporarily laid aside for the purpose of taking up the bill referred to by him. Is there objection?

Mr. MYERS. I desire to ask the Senator from Alabama if his bill will lead to any discussion or opposition.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will withdraw it if it does.

Mr. MYERS. Then I shall not object to this request; but I give notice that I shall object to any other request of the kind. I hope this bill will not consume any time; and if it does, I hope the Senator from Alabama will withdraw it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I regret to hear my colleague say that, because I was about to ask the same thing in the case of the radium bill.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, with great deference to my colleague I can not consent to that, because the radium bill will take a long time.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Regular order!

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to temporarily laying aside the unfinished business and granting unanimous consent to consider the bill referred to by the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Do I understand that the request is that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside for the purpose of taking up this bill?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes. Is there any objection?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Before I agree to that I wish to ask whether the request is that immediately upon the termination of this bill——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. We will return to the unfinished business.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. We will return to the unfinished business? That is part of the unanimous consent, I understand?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is part of the unanimous consent.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Then I do not object.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. If the discussion of this bill should run up to the hour of adjournment, would not the joint resolution of the Senator from Montana be displaced?

HORSESHOE BATTLE GROUND MOVEMENT.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will say that there will be no discussion of the bill to which I refer. If there is any discussion of it, I will withdraw the bill. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9671) to appropriate $5,000 to erect a suitable monument on the battle grounds at the Horseshoe, on the Tallapoosa River, in the State of Alabama.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It authorizes the Secretary of War to cause to be erected on the Horseshoe Battle Ground, on the Tallapoosa River, in the State of Alabama, a memorial to the men who fought in that battle under the command of Gen. Andrew Jackson, at a cost not to exceed $5,000. But no part of the appropriation shall be used for the purchase of any land in connection with the construction of the proposed monument; that the sole charge for the care and maintenance of the memorial shall be borne by the State of Alabama, or by some other authority designated by the governor of the State of Alabama; and that the design for the memorial shall be subject to the approval of the Commission of Fine Arts.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE REPUBLIC COAL CO.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 41) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to sell or lease certain public lands to the Republic Coal Co., a corporation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA].

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I simply rise to say, as I said yesterday, as the author of the joint resolution, and having an interest in it, that I hope the amendment will not prevail, because I believe it would very greatly imperil the chances of the joint resolution becoming a law.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the author of the amendment is not in the Chamber; and I therefore suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

So Mr. GRONNA's amendment to the amendment of the committee was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. The adoption of the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota necessitates another amendment to the joint resolution.

Mr. GRONNA. I have sent to the clerks' desk an amendment. I ask that it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. Add at the end of the amendment just agreed to the following words:

In the event of a lease thereof, the lease shall be upon such terms as to length and life, royalty and remuneration, payments, and other details and under such rules and regulations as may be reasonable and the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota to the amendment.

Mr. WALSH. I should like to have the Senator from North Dakota explain the purport of the amendment. I do not see that it adds anything to the joint resolution.

Mr. GRONNA. I will say to the Senator from Montana it is the same language that was in the original joint resolution. It is necessary, I will say to the Senator, to have that language included.

Mr. JONES. I ask the Senator from North Dakota if it would permit the Secretary of the Interior to make a lease of a thousand years?

Mr. GRONNA. I intend to offer an amendment later which will remove that objection.

Mr. JONES. The amendment the Senator has just offered would allow him to make a lease for a thousand years.

Mr. GRONNA. It leaves it in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. JONES. I say it would permit him to make a valid lease for a thousand years.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA].

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRONNA. I offer the amendment to the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add to the amendment as amended the following proviso:

Provided, That one-half of the amount received by the Government as rental therefor shall be paid into the treasury of the State of Montana for the benefit of the public schools of that State.

Mr. WALSH. As a substitute for that, I have an amendment to offer. I wish to say in this connection that if a sale of this property should be made, the proceeds are to be taken care of under the provisions of the general reclamation act, and the proceeds of the sale of the land would go into the reclamation fund. In case, however, a lease is made there is no provision of law now specifically providing for the disposition that should be made of the rental. It is to take care of that condition that the amendment is now proffered by the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. FALL. Will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. WALSH. Certainly.

Mr. FALL. Under the reclamation act is there provision for the proceeds of the sale of minerals going to the reclamation fund?

Mr. WALSH. It applies to the proceeds of the sales of all public lands, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. FALL. But this is not public land. I understand a portion of the land included in this measure is owned by private individuals, and this is proposing a sale of the minerals.

Mr. WALSH. Lest such a suggestion might be urged against the act, I have taken care of it in an amendment which I desire to propose. A number of bills are pending here providing for the leasing of coal lands and other lands containing mineral deposits. There is at least one general bill on the subject, and in that provision is found concerning the disposition of the rental; and it is a very wise provision, I think. If that system should be adopted with that provision, it would manifestly be desirable to have entire harmony in these measures, so that the avails from this lease or any lease executed under this act should be disposed of in exactly the same way as the avails of leases made under the provisions of the general act.

I offer, therefore, as a substitute for the amendment to the amendment the language that is found in the bill proposed in relation to the disposition of the deposits of coal, oil, gas, phosphates, and other things of that kind under the general law, as follows:

That all moneys received from rentals or on account of any sale under the provisions of this act—

I invite the attention of the Senator from New Mexico to the language—

That all moneys received from rentals or on account of any sale under the provisions of this act shall be paid into, reserved, and appropriated as a part of the reclamation fund created by the act of Congress approved June 17, 1902 (32 Stat. L., 388), but after use thereof in the construction of reclamation works and upon return to the reclamation fund of any such moneys in the manner provided by the reclamation act, 50 per cent of the amounts derived from such royalties and rentals so utilized in and returned to the reclamation fund shall be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury, after the expiration of each fiscal year, to the State of Montana, said moneys to be used by such State for the support of public schools or other educational institutions, or for the construction of public improvements, as the legislature of the State may direct.

The purpose of it is that rentals are to be paid first into the reclamation fund and then, after having been used in the reclamation fund, one half of the avails as they are returned from the reclamation fund eventually shall go to the State of Montana and the other half remain permanently in the reclamation fund.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I should like to ask the Senator a question. If that money is paid into the reclamation fund, when will it ever be paid to the State of Montana?

Mr. WALSH. It is a very difficult question that the Senator propounds.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Is it not a fact that if it is paid into the reclamation fund it may never be paid to the State of Montana?

Mr. WALSH. Of course that is a possibility; but we all contemplate—in fact, we hope—that every dollar that goes into the reclamation fund will eventually come back to us.

Mr. SHAFROTH. And this money can be used for the construction of reclamation projects in any part of the United States.

Mr. WALSH. Yes, sir; we are willing——

Mr. SHAFROTH. I am opposed to that. The State of Montana has made this coal land valuable, and it ought to get part of the money, at least. In fact, I think it ought to get all the money over and above the $10 and $20 per acre requirement, which was the rule of the United States for so many years.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator from Colorado speaks a very proper sentiment in what he has said, and I shall be disposed to agree with him about the general principle; but the same thing might be said about the avails of all our public lands. Perhaps it is just and proper that every dollar which comes from the sale of any public lands in the State of Montana should go into the treasury of the State of Montana, and every dollar that comes from the sale of public lands in the State of Colorado should go into the treasury of the State of Colorado; but the Government has entered upon the great work of the reclamation of the arid lands in the West. Many of these projects embrace lands that lie in two or more States. It is believed by all of us that that work can be better carried on by the General Government, and that all the avails of all the lands should be paid into one fund, the distribution to be made by the Secretary of the Interior, having, of course, always in mind the source from which the greater portion of the fund is derived.

So I do not think, Mr. President, that we ought to take these various funds and turn them over to the States in the first instance, to be put in the Treasury for utilization in the particular State from which they come. They ought always, I think, to go into one general fund, first, for utilization wherever the work may seem to require them.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, the theory upon which the reclamation projects are being carried out is that each will be paid for by the water users under that particular project. That the advances of the funds derived from the public lands originally applied to create this fund have not been sufficient, of course, was long since discovered, and Congress authorized a loan; but the theory is that each reclamation project will be paid for by the water users under that particular project, and that in the meantime a certain percentage of the sale of all public lands shall be devoted to the general reclamation fund.

The proposition of the Senator is to go further and take the proceeds of all the mining leases. His theory is that instead of private owners securing title to coal lands, oil lands, and other lands, hereafter the Government of the United States shall retain those lands.

As I said on yesterday, I feel that I am going to be forced possibly by the majority to agree to some proposition of that kind; but if I am, I shall insist, so far as lies in my power, at any rate, upon the proposition that so fast as these minerals are made productive of every cent received from them the State in which they lie shall have an equitable portion of the proceeds.

Some of our country is yet unproductive. Some portion of our great western country is not yet developed. Great development has gone on in the State of Montana. I am glad to know that wonderful mining enterprises have sprung from the individual efforts of the prospectors, backed by the wealth of the experts in Montana, until it is a wonderfully developed mining State. Many other portions of our country are not so fortunate and have not yet been developed.

There is, of course, simply an opportunity for argument on this particular measure, because it is a special one, but the whole theory of legislation of this character is an absolute, entire reversal of the policy which has poured into the lap of this great Nation over $5,000,000 of accumulated wealth in gold and silver alone. That entire policy is to be absolutely reversed, and as to the remaining undeveloped portion of our domain our children are to be told that they shall not travel in the path made by their fathers, but that they shall only go upon that public domain to delve into the bowels of the earth to extract from the mines the mineral wealth which has made this country great, no longer having the privilege of going, as our fathers did, unrestricted; but they shall only be allowed to go when they obtain a right from the Secretary of the Interior here in Washington permitting them to go, and along with them, to supervise them in every effort which they may make, shall go a special agent of the Department of the Interior, and the Government shall then do what it has never done before, it shall take from the man who develops the mine or the man who discovers the mine a portion of the proceeds for governmental purposes.

We built up the State of Montana, we built up the great West, under the other theory. Now we are called upon to reverse it. The policy apparently which is going to be insisted upon is not only that you shall give to the central Government, the Nation, a portion of the wealth which you extract from the earth, but that the Government shall absolutely by law deprive the State of its opportunity to tax that wealth or to obtain any portion of it for its local self-government.

Mr. President, by the passage of legislation of this character along the lines so seriously insisted upon by the Senators from Montana, if they are allowed to carry out the theories which have been adopted in this joint resolution with such an amendment, not only the whole theory of our Government in the development by individual effort of the natural wealth of this country will be overthrown, but the whole theory upon which the Government even was founded will be overthrown. No longer will we have the units. Pursue this legislation a little further and you wipe out every State line and make the farmers of this Nation who are seeking to develop the undeveloped western country a Nation of peasant farmers of the United States, with the United States as a landlord. That is the whole theory upon which this proposed legislation is sought to be foisted upon the people of the United States.

In this matter it is of small moment, because this is simply special legislation such as was never before sought to be enacted upon the statutes of the United States, to my knowledge, in the interest of one railroad corporation in a great State of this Union, but it is the forerunner, we are told, of other legislation. It is blazing the pathway. It is of so little political moment at the present time that in the Senate of the United States Senators walk in from the cloak rooms and vote against the proposition to give to the States at least a small portion of the proceeds of wealth lying within their boundaries. Heretofore you have invited the people of the United States to go into the mountains, into the canyons, and into the deserts, and they have made this country what it is. Those people who, close to the Mississippi River, went into the mountains and on the deserts have given to you over $5,000,000 in gold and silver alone.

Mr. President, no Government expert ever discovered a mine; no Government expert ever opened a mine. No mining engineer ever located or opened a mine or, at least, discovered a mine. It has been the individual American, going from Maine or from Virginia or from Kentucky or from some other State, taking his life in his hands, buckling his belt a little tighter when he had nothing to eat, working for wages when he had nothing else to do, working on a ranch or a farm so that he could secure enough money to grubstake himself that he might go into the mountains and discover the wealth which made this country great. Now, what are you doing by such legislation as you are seeking to enact here? You are reserving to the Government the right absolutely to control the wealth which he has found and which his successors are undertaking to extract from the earth. You are going to socialism; you are wiping out State lines; you are destroying municipal local government just as rapidly as you can do it; and Senators remain in the cloakrooms and come in here and vote on a proposition simply, as they say, because they are voting with the committee, when you are destroying the very foundation of your Government.

This is not the proper occasion, possibly, upon which to call attention to the seriousness of this matter, but this effort is the more insidious simply because it affects only one railroad, one coal mine in one State in the Union. However, other legislation is pending in the hands of the Committee on Mines and Mining which is, to my mind, of the most vicious character. I know it is indorsed by sincere, patriotic people, but it is absolutely surversive of the republican form of government founded by our forefathers and upon which we have erected this magnificent empire.

Now, sir, before, even in so unimportant a matter as this, such theories are carried out, I want to call your attention to the fact that to-day or to-morrow you are going to be met with another proposition of a similar character, under the belief that the health of the Nation demands the conservation of a certain resource, which carries with it the power of this Government to control every gold and silver mine in the United States, every vanadium mine, every copper mine, every zinc mine, and every lead mine or other mine of whatsoever character, located after the passage of this joint resolution. I refer to the so-called radium bill. You have another bill pending along similar lines in the Alaskan leasing bill, the words of which have just been quoted by the chairman of the Committee on Mines and Mining, and it is to those words which I desire to call your attention. The coal, the oil, the phosphates, and the other minerals of like character not constituting the crown minerals, are to be held by the Government of the United States in ownership. You are to be allowed to develop them upon certain conditions; you are to go into my State. The State of New Mexico, Mr. President, has more coal within its boundaries to-day than has the State of Pennsylvania. The State of Pennsylvania is one of the most prosperous States in this Union; its development has been absolutely magnificent; it has assisted in developing every other State in this country, because it has been allowed to use, possibly in some instances to abuse, its natural resources; because it has been able to extract its iron ores, to combine them with its coal, and to make steel.

Now, you are seeking to tie my State, as you are tying it; you seek to adopt an entirely different theory hereafter. If it is to be forced upon us, and I am afraid it will be under this administration; if the reversal now of our former policy is to be foisted upon us by you Senators on the other side; if you are going to say to sovereign States, "No longer shall people come within your boundaries and be at liberty to acquire wealth and develop it for themselves," but under some socialistic theory, recently finding lodgment in the Democratic heart, the National Government in Washington will retain to itself that wealth; if you are going to foist upon us that theory—then, in the name of justice and of common sense, I ask you to give to my State a portion of the proceeds taken from its mines. That is all we ask; but the Senator has stated that we are going to give up the reclamation projects.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. FALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. WEST. To what extent does the sale of these lands affect the local self-government of the State?

Mr. FALL. Why, sir, in your State your public lands have been given you by the United States Government; you have had millions of acres in your State given to you for good roads and for other purposes; I have forgotten exactly the acreage, but, as I recall it, in the neighborhood of 3,000,000 acres were given to you from the public domain for such purposes. You have had magnificent empires. I have the figures and could produce them on very short notice.

Mr. WEST. I think the Senator from New Mexico is mistaken in reference to the public lands in the State of Georgia.

Mr. FALL. Possibly so as to the amount; but as to your having received the benefit of certain public-land gifts for railroad purposes in the State of Georgia, I think I am not mistaken.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the senior Senator from Georgia?

Mr. FALL. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. As my colleague [Mr. WEST] has just stated, the State of Georgia received none of the land in Georgia from the National Government.

Mr. FALL. What became of your public lands?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. We had no public lands that belonged to the Government at all.

Mr. FALL. What about the case of the People against Georgia?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. When Georgia came in as a Colony she received no public lands——

Mr. FALL. What about the case of the People against Georgia involving the public lands within your State?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. We received no public lands from the National Government. On the contrary, the State of Georgia yielded a vast area of public lands to the National Government.

Mr. FALL. Very well; it is not material to the argument.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The radium bill has not anything to do with it.

Mr. FALL. Very well; I withdraw everything that I have said about Georgia.

Now, I want to ask you how you developed your State—by holding strings upon your timberlands and upon your farming lands, or by allowing the United States Government to hold a reserve right to control your timberlands or your private lands or your mineral wealth, your iron mines, or your coal? Was your great, magnificent State developed in that method, or was it developed by the individual effort, first, of the pioneer, who had a right to what he could buy, to what he could get, the State retaining the right to tax it for its own purposes? We can not tax a foot of public land in New Mexico; and under the theory which you are now seeking to adopt we shall never be able to tax it so long as you retain in the National Government all ownership of lands or of the mineral wealth under the surface.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. FALL. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not wish the Senator from New Mexico to understand from my interruption and my reference to the way in which Georgia ceded her lands that I am in favor of preventing the opportunity for the proper development of the West.

Mr. FALL. I do not so understand the Senator. I am somewhat acquainted with the course of the Senator when he was the Secretary of the Interior of the United States.

Mr. WEST. I understand the position of the Senator is that he is objecting to the leasing of lands?

Mr. FALL. I am insisting, sir, that the people coming into my State should be allowed to develop my State without paying tribute to the Interior Department of the United States further than to pay the price placed by you as a Member of Congress upon the lands or the mines, as has been the practice in this country up to the present date. That is what I am insisting upon; but this legislation now is simply one of the wedges——

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. FALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. WALSH. I rather think the Senator from New Mexico was not in on yesterday when I invited the attention of the Senate to the fact that that statement was hardly in accordance with the historical record. The historical record is that we never did sell any mineral lands at all until 1829. We adhered religiously to the leasing system, and we continued in that system——

Mr. FALL. Why, Mr. President, if the Senator will show me where there was $500 a year taken from a gold or a silver mine prior to the year 1834, I shall be glad to have his statistics.

Mr. WALSH. Of course the Senator's challenge can not be answered.

Mr. FALL. I think not. When the Senator from Montana refers to the year 1829, that is prior to the time when we produced any gold or silver.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator from Montana is not talking about silver. He is talking about mineral lands; he is referring to lead mines, which were operated extensively.

Mr. FALL. You are referring back to something which you must forget every now and then—the distinction between Crown minerals and non-Crown minerals. That was the old theory.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Undoubtedly the Senator from Montana is referring to the experience of the Government at the Galena lead fields, where the War Department at one time made a lease of certain lands, with very disastrous results to the United States.

Mr. WALSH. I said on yesterday that the experience was not satisfactory. I simply rose to set history aright. It is not true that we have always pursued the other system.

Mr. FALL. I should like to ask the Senator how many tons of coal were produced, and from that production how many tons of iron were produced, in this country prior to 1829? We started out upon the old theory of the distinction between Crown minerals and nonprecious minerals. Before we enacted our mining laws we produced none of the precious minerals prior to 1834, or practically none, in this country. The practice under the development of the coal mines, the iron mines, the gold, silver, copper, lead, zinc, and the other mines of this country is such as I have described; and that is the historical course. For the Senator to go back prior to the adoption of the laws upon the subject and say that history does not bear me out is rather, in my judgment, begging the question.

Mr. SHAFROTH. If the Senator from New Mexico will yield to me for a moment, I should like to make a statement to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. WEST] with reference to the question he asked the Senator from New Mexico. I want to state to the Senator from Georgia that the very violent opposition we have to the perpetual ownership upon the part of the Government in these lands arises from the fact that under the enabling act which admitted each State into the Union there is a reservation that no Government land shall be taxed until disposed of, and the law has been construed to mean that the General Government must, in order to enable the States to maintain their governments, dispose of the lands. The distress which the State is put to by not being permitted to tax the land is enormous. In our section of the country the taxes paid and the reasonable interest on each yearly payment will in 30 years amount to the value of the land. If the Government land is to be forever exempted from taxation, you can see that the increased burden placed upon the people who pay the taxes is equivalent to taxing those people the value of those lands every 30 years. This is a great hardship on the people of the West who have to pay the taxes, and yet they never own a foot of that land. That is absolutely contrary to the principles of our Government and contrary to what was the intention of its founders. I thank the Senator for permission to interrupt him.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. FALL. I do.

Mr. WEST. For the benefit of the Senator from Colorado, I desire to state that I voted against the amendment allowing the Government to lease the lands. I preferred that the Government should sell them.

Mr. FALL. If the proposition, Mr. President, were to dispose of these lands by sale, such as the Senator is familiar with in his State—to sell them outright—then, of course, the taxing power of the State could immediately be invoked; but the disposition of this coal land as set forth in this bill and, I presume, the disposition of other portions of the public domain, as set out in the other bills which are going to be insisted on, is a very involved proposition.

Mr. President, I fear the Senator does not understand the matter thoroughly. Take, for instance, a concrete case. We have a piece of coal land in New Mexico which has already been acquired. The State government itself and the county governments can tax the use of the surface of that coal land—460 or 640 acres, or whatever the acreage may be—and derive revenue for State purposes, because the surface may be used for grazing, for agricultural, or for other purposes, and may be taxed. That is the case when the land is sold outright. So the State can tax the improvements placed upon that land; and when the coal or the mineral wealth lying under the surface is mined it can tax every ton as it comes to the mouth of the mine; but under the theory which we are now going to be asked to adopt as to the reservation of the Government's title in the minerals in the land the State is going to be deprived of that right to tax; and how are the local and municipal governments going to be supported? We are not going to be allowed to develop our States as you have developed your States, and as the other great States of the Union have been developed, but the Government at Washington is going to reserve always the ownership of these coal lands, as we are told by the Senator who has the matter in charge.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield further to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. FALL. I do.

Mr. WEST. I understand an amendment has been adopted to this joint resolution whereby the output of this coal mine can be taxed by the State government even under a lease.

Mr. FALL. I think the amendment is defective even in that regard. I have stated that if the former policy, such as was followed in the Senator's State, is pursued and a man acquires the outright ownership in the minerals, whether coal or whatever they are, the State can tax not only the fee of the land, as suggested by one of my colleagues, but the fee of the mineral under the land; the State can tax either or both; but under the theory which we are going to adopt hereafter the Government of the United States retains the title; the State can not tax the Government title; and therefore you must make some provision by which the State government may acquire something of the revenue to be taken out of the mines.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. FALL. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I voted for the amendment awhile ago. Perhaps when I did so I was not as well informed as I should have been; but I thought it involved a question of the direct sale to an individual or to a company and not a question as to a leasehold. I thought I was so voting. I want here to declare, in confirmation of what the Senator from New Mexico has said, that so long as there is foreign landlordism because of the ownership of an individual, there is that much threat and danger hanging over the possibility of the development of our resources; but when you make that landlordism governmental it is even worse, because the resources of the country are then subject to the whim and caprice of Congresses which may hereafter come and which may know as little about the matter as the many Congresses which have gone before have known.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, the Senator says the amendment he has offered is taken from a bill which is in his hands, which applies to the general policy of handling the coal and other mineral lands in this country, and for that reason I have gone beyond the mere line of argument which would be followed in discussing this bill itself. I have expressed to some extent my agreement with the policy of allowing the acquisition of an increased acreage, at least, of coal lands as is contemplated in this joint resolution, provided it is done by general and not by special legislation, and I am willing to go further in that respect than some of the Senators here. I know that there are a very great number of people in this country who believe that, while they have enjoyed all the benefits of the development of the public lands and the mineral wealth of their respective States, they should still retain the right to draw directly revenue from the development of exactly the same lands in my State, and I am afraid that that sentiment is going to be so overwhelming that we will have to bow to it and agree that you may foist upon us a lease system for the handling of our mineral wealth, contrary, as I have said, to the entire practice and custom and course of this Government up to this time; but I desire to take this opportunity of calling your attention to the fact that if you reserve the title in the Government of the United States you must provide by some method or in some way that a part of the revenue derived shall go to the local government or else you strike the deadliest blow at local government which was ever struck by any party or by any Congress in the history of this country.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, in offering the amendment I did not wish it to be understood that I opposed anything which the Senator from Montana wished to have incorporated with regard to the disposition of this money, because this particular land is in the Senator's own State. I was under the impression, however, that there is a sentiment among Senators that at least a portion of the money derived from such uses as this should go to the States; and I believe that under the provisions of the Senator's amendment, if I understand the amendment correctly, none of it would go to the public schools.

Mr. WALSH. I will say, for the information of the Senator, that that is not exactly correct. The amendment provides that it shall first go to the reclamation fund, to be used in the reclamation fund, and then, after its return from the reclamation fund, instead of going back again to the reclamation fund, one half of it goes to the State of Montana for educational and other like purposes, the other half remaining in the reclamation fund.

Mr. GRONNA. Very well, Mr. President, I will stand corrected. I did not make myself clear; but I do not believe that this money will be paid to the States for school purposes for at least a considerable time. The reclamation fund is a Federal fund; it belongs to the Federal Government; and it is a reimbursable fund. The Federal Government has a mortgage on the farms of the settlers who get the benefit of the water under the irrigation projects. I was under the impression that it would be better that at least a portion of this money should go to the upbuilding of the State; that is, that it should be used for school purposes. I will say to the Senator from Montana, however, that I have no pride of opinion about my amendment. We can take a vote on it, and let the Senate decide.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, an amendment has been adopted providing that instead of selling this coal land it shall be leased. I desire to see if I understand the matter correctly.

Mr. MYERS. May I interrupt the Senator right there?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. MYERS. The amendment provides that the lands may either be sold or leased. It is optional.

Mr. McCUMBER. I suppose, then, if there is a provision for leasing, that at least there ought to be some other provision as to what shall be done with the money received from the leases. If I understand correctly, my colleague's amendment provides that one-half of the money received from the leases shall go directly to the State of Montana. The amendment offered by the Senator from Montana, if I understand it correctly, provides that all of the money ultimately will go to the State; that after it has first gone into the reclamation fund and the reclamation fund has been paid in full, then, according to the terms of the amendment, the money received shall go to the State. I want to get the matter clear.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator has not got it quite right. Under the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota one half of the rentals go direct to the State of Montana and the other half of the rentals go into the General Treasury of the United States, to be available for all governmental purposes. I have not had an opportunity to confer with the Senator from North Dakota, but I am resolutely opposed to that proposition. Under the amendment offered by myself, all the rentals go into the reclamation fund the same as the proceeds of all the sales of the public lands now go into the reclamation fund.

Mr. McCUMBER. We agree, so far.

Mr. WALSH. The reclamation fund is a reimbursable fund. When these moneys are reimbursed to the reclamation fund by the settlers paying for the land, then one half of the amount which thus goes back goes to the State of Montana and the other half goes into the reclamation fund again.

Mr. McCUMBER. What objection would the Senator have to his State receiving its half in the first instance, instead of waiting until the money had passed through the reclamation fund, and then indirectly at some future time coming into the hands of the State?

Mr. WALSH. Of course, I could not possibly object to the State of Montana getting as much of this as it can possibly get; but I put it upon the general ground that there ought to be one general scheme for the disposition of the rentals we may get, if we shall enter upon the project of renting the mineral lands at all, and when we come to provide a general plan for the rental of any mineral lands, I do not think it wise to make a provision that any portion of the rentals shall go to the States. When we cease to sell these lands, the reclamation fund then ceases, as a matter of course; and I desire that all the rentals shall go into the reclamation fund.

Mr. McCUMBER. While I am not very much in favor of a system of landlordism in any State, still, if we are to have such a system, it would seem to me that it would be much better and simpler to pay the proper proportion over to the State directly, to do with it as it sees fit. The State will immediately begin to receive some return, at least, from the public lands in the State; and I would think it would be far better under this policy to do this, if we are to adopt the leasing system at all, rather than first pay it into the reclamation fund.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, if I understand the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana, it provides that the proceeds arising from the disposition of this coal land shall first be covered into the reclamation fund, to be used in furtherance of the reclamation projects, and when that money, having first been spent to construct the irrigation projects, comes back to the fund, then one-half of it is to go to the State of Montana.

Now, let me ask the Senator from Montana how he is ever going to determine that that money has come back to the fund? The reclamation fund, as the Senator has said, is a reimbursable fund, but it is also a revolving fund. The law contemplates that it is a perpetual fund; that when the proceeds of the sales of the public lands have been spent in building the irrigation projects the settlers upon them shall reimburse the General Government, and that money so reimbursed shall go back into the reclamation fund to be spent again. I do not see how the Senator is going to trace the moneys which arise from the disposition of the coal lands into the irrigation fund and then trace them separately from the main fund, so as to finally turn one-half over to Montana. It is not earmarked in any way.

Mr. WALSH. I will say, in answer to the Senator, that the difficulty which seems to trouble him presented itself to me very forcefully; but I am assured by the officers of the Reclamation Service that it is a simple matter of bookkeeping, and that it can be attended to without any difficulty at all.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Now, let us see whether it is a simple matter of bookkeeping. Here is a fund which consists, we will say, of $50,000,000. That fund is made up from innumerable transactions, literally from hundreds of thousands of sales of public lands, covered into a general fund. That money is spent in all of the various irrigation projects throughout the West, and that money comes back a hundred dollars at a time or a thousand dollars at a time from the different irrigation projects. It seems to me it would be utterly impossible to trace the moneys that had arisen from the disposition of the coal lands in Montana.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, it does not seem so to me. There is a certain amount of money now in the reclamation fund. There is a certain additional amount coming in from time to time. There has been a certain amount expended. As a matter of course, when that amount is returned everything down to a certain specific period of time is canceled; that is to say, the obligation is canceled, it is wiped out. This simply becomes a question of the time when these funds go into the reclamation fund; that must be marked; and also the time when every dollar that went into the reclamation fund theretofore has been wiped out and canceled by the return. Then the next money that comes in is necessarily applied to the extinction of this obligation, if you may so speak of it, so that it becomes a question of bookkeeping as to when the settlers have paid back the money that is derived from these particular rentals.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Then we should have to wait until the entire reclamation fund had been expended, and then until the entire amount of the expenditures had been returned to the reclamation fund, which might be a matter of 25 years or more.

Mr. WALSH. I do not see it that way. Let us assume that to-day $75,000,000 of the reclamation fund is out; and we will assume, likewise, that to-day $50,000,000 comes in from this particular source, the rental of this property. As soon as $75,000,000 has been returned to the reclamation fund, we immediately begin the extinction of this particular contribution, and at the end of the year so much of the contribution as has been returned is divided in two, one half of it remaining in the reclamation fund and the other half going to the State of Montana.

I will confess that I myself was confronted with the difficulty that has presented itself to the mind of the Senator from Utah; but I was assured that it was simply a matter of bookkeeping, and it looks to me that way now.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, the great objection that is ordinarily urged by the opponents of retention of title in the public lands by the Federal Government is that it deprives the States of the revenue which otherwise would be derived from taxation. The amendment of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] meets that objection by providing that one-half of the proceeds from the sale or lease of these lands shall go directly into the State treasury.

I rose largely for the purpose of stating that while I have at times advocated a continuance of the activities of the Federal Government in the management of the public lands within the States I have done it because of a belief that it was for the benefit of the States and of the people residing in the vicinity of those lands. I welcome the opportunity here to vote that the proceeds or a large share of the proceeds of a lease of coal lands, if they shall be leased by the Government, shall immediately go into the treasury of the State to help bear the expenses of the State government; and I know of no better disposition of the money than to apply it to the maintenance of the public schools.

While it is possible, as the Senator from Montana says, that the reclamation fund may revert in part at some future time to the States, it is not a State fund; it is a Federal fund and it is a wealthy fund. It is a fund which is inevitably bound to be opulent with the proceeds of these irrigated lands. Of course it has been delayed. The development of Government reclamation projects has had more or less the same experience that private projects have had. The lands have not become profitable as quickly as it was hoped they would, but they will become so. As the Senator from Montana knows, whether they become so at an early date or whether the profits may be delayed, it is still a matter of the utmost uncertainty as to what portion of those funds shall be returned to the State in which the public lands were sold. In my judgment, the time for the State to get the benefit of any revenue from the public lands is when that revenue begins.

I wish to say, if I may be allowed, on the general question, which is not really involved in this amendment, but which has been debated here, that, as I understand, the whole object of a governmental reservation of public area in a State is not for any purpose or object of the Federal Government as such, but it is based upon the theory that if a forest is to be preserved it is to be preserved for the benefit of the people living in the vicinity of that forest. I know that the administration of these reserved areas has been in many instances bad, and that the objects and purposes of the statute have not always been carried out in good faith. In this reclamation question, however, what is more necessary for the development of the great arid lands of the West than that the sources of the streams from which the water is to be obtained shall be protected, and that the forests shall not be destroyed in the ruthless manner in which they have been destroyed in so many of our North Middle States, such as Michigan and Wisconsin, without regard to the future of the State or the needs of the people in the State?

There are no people in the United States who can derive benefit from a forest reservation in the State of Washington but the people in the State of Washington, and it is for their benefit that the Government exercises the sovereignty, which it has, however much it may be disputed here, over the Federal domain, that that power may be interposed between the welfare and the prosperity of the inhabitants of the State and some grasping and powerful individual or private corporation who seeks to aggrandize himself as speedily as possible without any consideration of what the future might bring to those people. Now, there is an opportunity, so far as it goes, and so far as the question of revenues is concerned, to turn those revenues into the local treasury to be used for local purposes.

I was very much interested in noting in the report of the Secretary of the Interior upon this bill a reference to the only other leasing bill that is upon the statute books. If the Secretary of the Interior should lease the lands covered by this bill instead of selling them, it would not be the first instance in which the Federal Government has leased coal lands. Upon turning to that statute, however, I find that it is, to my mind, a curiosity of legislation. I was a Member of the Senate at the time it was enacted, but I did not know anything about it, as it is impossible to know about everything that occurs here, and I suppose comparatively few Senators knew anything about it or had it in mind. It may have gone through by unanimous consent, so far as I know; but it involves a great tract of coal land, and was passed in the form of a joint resolution instead of a bill. It is in these words:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to allow—

That is a peculiar word to use in conveyancing or in making a grant of land—to allow the Owl Creek Coal Co. to continue the operation of the mine or mines upon any of the lands embraced in Lander, Wyo., coal entries Nos. 18 to 49—

Some 31 coal entries—inclusive, until otherwise provided by law, upon such conditions and under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, what is the date of that act?

Mr. POINDEXTER. August 1, 1912. It was passed during the dog days.

Mr. BORAH. I suppose that accounts for it. Perhaps the word "allow" was intentionally used, so as to suggest to the Secretary of the Interior that he pay no attention while the rest of them were getting the coal. Was that intended to be a leasing law?

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is a peculiar word, and the Senator and the Secretary of the Interior can give such construction to it and draw such inferences from it as they may. However, under it the Secretary, as a matter of fact, is leasing the land described. It is having just the effect the Senator suggested.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do.

Mr. WALSH. I happen to know the history of that legislation, and if it will be of any interest to the Senator, I shall be very glad to state it.

A number of entries were made in the State of Wyoming the validity of which was attacked. It was alleged that they were made fraudulently and by means of dummy entrymen. Criminal prosecutions were instituted and prosecuted successfully. Proceedings were likewise instituted in the Land Office for the purpose of canceling the entries. Eventually they were all canceled. Meanwhile, the company had established a plant, and it was engaged in mining the properties. The act authorized the Secretary to allow the company to continue mining.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. In connection with what the Senator from Montana has stated, I wish to add that there was a town built up in Wyoming at the coal fields, and I believe every man in the town petitioned the Secretary of the Interior that this joint resolution be passed by Congress, and if it had not been passed every soul in the town would have had to move away. The resolution simply provided that the Secretary of the Interior might allow the mining of coal under whatever regulations he might prescribe until the question of title was finally settled between the litigants and the Interior Department.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, it is very evident from the statement of the Senator from Utah that this was not an exclusive right.

Mr. SMOOT. It is not an exclusive right.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It is not an exclusive right, but a general right, of which all people within a certain radius may avail themselves. The joint resolution which is now pending, as I understand, is exclusive in its operations.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, the Senator from Michigan is in error about that. The act authorized the Secretary of the Interior to allow this one particular company to mine coal there, and, of course, everybody else was inhibited from mining coal there.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Why, of course. I think if the Senator from Michigan will observe the language of the joint resolution he will agree that it was exclusive. The Owl Creek Coal Co. was a criminal trespasser in possession, so it was "allowed" to remain, and no one else was "allowed."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I was not commenting upon the language of the joint resolution; I was commenting upon the statement of the Senator from Utah, which, as he made it apply, would be exclusive in its character. As I understand, the joint resolution we are about to vote upon is a very radical departure from the general policy of the Government for many years, and seeks to vest in a particular company, to meet a particular emergency in its affairs, a right not given to other people or other companies in that vicinity or in any other part of the United States.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is perfectly true, and in my judgment it is obnoxious to all just principles of the public-land policy of this country for that reason.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. In other words, if the Senator will permit me, why may not a bill be introduced authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to lease certain timberlands in the public domain, in the national forests or reservations, in order to facilitate the construction of freight cars to relieve a congested situation? If we are going by piecemeal to make any inroads into the general policy of the Government, we might better have a general rule which could be availed of by all citizens, whether corporate or otherwise.

This looks like a species of class legislation that you would scarcely expect to emanate from the other side of the Chamber, and smacks of a degree of solicitude for one particular railroad company that does not appeal very strongly to me.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Michigan in that regard. I have no objection to liberal legislation in the interest of the Milwaukee Railroad Co., but I do not think they ought to be granted unusual and special favors. I think they ought to be allowed every reasonable opportunity to carry on their business. This joint resolution, as it was originally introduced, had the effect of granting unqualifiedly to this company 10,000,000 tons of this coal, which is described as valuable coal, an excellent quality of semibituminous coal. That would have been a violation of the principle, for which a great many men interested in that question have been contending, of prohibiting railroad companies from dealing in coal and from putting themselves into the coal markets of the country with the great advantage as against their competitors of controlling their own transportation of the commodity which they are selling.

It is true that during this discussion here that objection may be said to have been removed by an amendment which was adopted, but it is nevertheless interesting as showing the influences and the policies of which the Senator from Michigan speaks in introducing this joint resolution and pressing with so much ardor for its passage.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, may I make a suggestion right there?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. MYERS. The Senator makes reference, and a number of other Senators have made reference, to the form in which the joint resolution was originally introduced. It was originally introduced, in the main material point, just about in the same form in which it has now been put by amendment. As introduced its language was "to sell or lease." The leasing part was stricken out by the committee. It has now been written in by the Senate, but as originally introduced it was "to sell or lease."

Mr. POINDEXTER. But as it was originally introduced there was no restriction upon this company from entering the coal markets of the country with the coal.

Mr. MYERS. No; that is true. This company, as a matter of fact, never has entered the market. Its entire output has always been taken by the Milwaukee road, and I very freely and gladly admit that the amendment which has been proposed by my colleague and adopted is a very wise and prudent amendment.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am glad the Senator agrees with me and corroborates the statement I made. That was all I had in view in making the statement. I do not know whether the Milwaukee Railroad is selling coal in the open market or not, but I know that it is engaged in a great many other activities.

Mr. MYERS. I just wish to say it is not. It uses its entire output in the operation of its trains.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. POINDEXTER. If the Senator will pardon me for a moment, I know that the Milwaukee railroad is one of the largest lumber operators in the West. It has been one of the greatest beneficiaries of a little rider that was attached to an appropriation bill in Congress a few years ago, by which the Northern Pacific Railroad Co. was allowed to exchange the slopes of Mount Rainier, consisting of glaciers, rocks, and burnt stumps, for Government scrip.

Mr. THOMAS. That was in 1898.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is true, as the Senator from Colorado says. The Milwaukee road has been the purchaser of that scrip, and through its subsidiary companies, just as it proposes to own this coal mine, it has become one of the greatest timber owners and lumber operators and a participant in the methods which have been described—I described them in a resolution which I introduced at one time in the House of Representatives, which I shall not go into here—the detestable methods of various companies in getting settlers off land which they had entered as homesteads but which the lumber companies desired to acquire as timberlands. So, I say, I do not know whether the Milwaukee railroad operates in coal or not, but I do know that it is a great lumber operator.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Is the constituent company which is supposed to take over this leasing privilege incorporated under the laws of Montana?

Mr. MYERS. It is, Mr. President.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. For what purpose?

Mr. MYERS. For the purpose of mining coal, as I understand. I never have seen the articles of incorporation, but that is my information from reliable sources.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mining it and vending it?

Mr. MYERS. I could not say as to the exact words. I assume that it is operating in accordance with its charter, and it is mining and selling coal.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes; undoubtedly. Now, if it is incorporated for the purpose of mining and selling coal, and the company is owned substantially by the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad—is that the case?

Mr. MYERS. It is a subsidiary corporation of the Milwaukee Railroad.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. But if that is the case how does it differ from the West Virginia Central Railroad, which had constituent companies and owned large tracts of coal lands? It has not been the policy of the Government for a number of years to look with much favor upon constituent companies owned by transportation lines controlling any particular output of this character. To declare affirmatively now in a statute that such a thing may be done in order to meet an emergency in the affairs of a particular company seems to me to be going beyond the point that the Government has ever gone before.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, with the consent of the Senator from Washington, may I answer that in a word?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes; in a word.

Mr. MYERS. Perhaps in 15 or 20 words.

The Northern Pacific Railroad Co. owns coal mines in Montana. The Great Northern road owns coal mines. Other companies own coal mines. As I understand, under the Hepburn Act they are not allowed to utilize the products of those mines in selling them to the public, in competing with other producers, but they must use the output entirely for their own purposes of locomotion. That is just what the Milwaukee road is seeking to do with the products of this mine. It can not sell them to the public. It must of necessity and under the law use them for its own purposes.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, the Senator from Montana is entirely mistaken as to the general condition of railroad coal mines. The Northern Pacific is one of the greatest coal dealers of the State of Washington, through its subsidiary companies. It does not confine the use of the coal which it mines from lands it acquired from the Government to its own consumption. It sells it in the coal markets of the State of Washington, and probably also of the State of Montana.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, it must do so through subsidiary companies. It could not, as I understand, do so in its own name.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Why, yes.

Mr. MYERS. Even so, this company does not propose to do anything of the kind.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is a distinction entirely without a difference. It is entirely unsatisfactory to the general sense of public justice that when a law prohibits a railroad from dealing in one of the commodities which it transports the railroad company continues in defiance of the law to do that, and when it is brought into the courts to stop it from doing it, its answer is that it is doing it through its subsidiary company. It is nevertheless doing it.

Mr. MYERS. I am no defender of the Northern Pacific Railroad Co. Is it violating the Hepburn Act? Does the Senator claim that? I do not know whether it is or not.

Mr. POINDEXTER. A great many railroads are violating the Hepburn Act. They are violating it in effect, although sustained by the courts, because the courts held that the ownership of stock in a subsidiary company was not equivalent to the ownership of the commodity. I have not any doubt that the Northern Pacific Railroad Co. is doing that. Dozens of railroads are doing it. I noticed a few days ago that the Pennsylvania Railroad Co.—and I think it was a tribute to the good sense with which the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. is managed—voluntarily divested itself of its coal mines; or, at least, it was so stated.

Mr. MYERS. May I say a word? That is not the case here. The Milwaukee Railroad needs all of this coal, and has to have it, or else it would not be asking it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is an entirely immaterial matter, as the Senator from Michigan has already pointed out, whether it sells coal from another mine and uses this coal on the railroad, or whether it uses this coal to sell and burns the other coal on the railroad. It makes no difference.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a minute? I simply wish to make a statement.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NELSON. If I understand the amendment offered to this joint resolution by the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] two days ago, it in terms prohibits the company from utilizing this particular coal for any other purpose than its own use. Am I correct in that understanding? I will address my question to the junior Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH. That is the purport of one of the amendments.

Mr. NELSON. So that question does not arise in this case.

Now, what are the facts here? If the Senator will pardon me for taking a little of his time, the facts here are that we propose to allow this company, a subsidiary of the Milwaukee company, to acquire somewhere around 2,000 acres of coal land, and under the amendments that have been adopted the Government can either sell it or lease it. In addition to that, the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Montana the other day, and adopted, expressly prohibits the company from using this coal except for its own purposes. Therefore, to my mind, the danger which the Senators are discussing does not arise in this particular case.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I regret very much to differ at any time with the Senator from Minnesota, but I think the danger nevertheless exists here. Although it is true, as he has said, that the sale of this particular coal may be under the amendment prohibited, nevertheless turning the coal over to the Republic Coal Co., which by its very name is a coal dealer, under the power of its charter it would have authority to sell coal anywhere that it chose to sell it.

Mr. NELSON. The company might sell its other coal anywhere it chose, as the Senator says, but it would not under the amendment of the Senator from Montana have a right to sell this particular coal except to the railroad company for railroad uses.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes; but that would leave the company in the market with a certain amount of coal in competition with any other company that was selling coal in the market. If it did not acquire the coal provided in the joint resolution, it would then have to use the other coal which it has for the railroad consumption.

I want to turn away from that phase of the question, Mr. President, and to speak very briefly of another question which it seems to me ought to be considered before the joint resolution is voted on. The report of the Secretary of the Interior upon the joint resolution points out that the greater part of the land that is covered by it has been entered by homesteaders. Some of it has been entered under the timber and stone act. In the case of a portion of it patents have been issued, reserving to the Government the coal under the land, so, as he says, the Government is free to grant the coal as to that portion so reserved. But that is a minor part of the entire tract, and as to the remaining part he uses this language:

> The remaining tracts covered by the seven timber and stone entries, under which rights have not as yet been fully adjudicated, are not now subject to coal entry, nor can it be determined whether the coal deposits within the lands covered by such entries will remain to the United States for future disposition.

So there are seven claimants of seven different entries claiming the right to this coal, which it is proposed here that the United States by act of Congress shall grant to this railroad company. I think that would be a manifest injustice, even though the proviso contained in the joint resolution should have the effect which it is claimed to have—which, in my judgment, it would not have at all—of protecting the rights of these entrymen. To say the very least, it would shoulder upon every one of the timber and stone entrymen a lawsuit with the railroad company; and I think that would be an injustice and contrary to the American spirit of the protection of the small entrymen with as jealous care as we protect the rights of a great property owner such as a railroad company.

Referring to the land just mentioned, in which the right to the coal is in process of adjudication and not yet adjudicated, the Asssistant Secretary of the Interior, further corroborating the interpretation I have just put upon his langungo, says, speaking of the land affected by this measure and the amount of it——

> The land is encumbered in the particulars hereinbefore recited, so that the area may be ultimately largely reduced.

That is, if these men maintain their right to the coal, the railroad company would not get that part of it. Yet it is here proposed to expressly grant to the railroad company this coal. I do not think it ought to be done.

There is a proviso in the joint resolution which reads as follows:

> Provided, however, That said sale shall be made subject to the legal or equitable rights, inchoate or vested, of any surface or other entryman on any part of said lands, and subject to the laws now in force governing the sales of coal or other minerals where the surface lands and rights are reserved or have been previously disposed of.

I have read that proviso very carefully, and I venture to assert that it would have no effect whatever as protecting the rights of these entrymen to the coal. It would protect their rights to the surface of the land because it uses the word "surface":

> That said sale shall be made subject to the legal or equitable rights, inchoate or vested, of any surface or other entryman on any part of said lands.

To say the least, it would inject the railroad company as a grantee under this act as an interested party into the litigation which the entrymen are now having with the United States Government, through the Land Office, as to their rights to this coal.

If the Milwaukee Railroad Co. desires this coal and it is deemed wise on the part of the Government to make a special grant to it of the coal, it seems to me that it should be deferred until the rights of these private holders are adjudicated and then determined whether the United States has anything there to grant.

I am opposed to the joint resolution for that reason. I am opposed to it aside from that because it is special legislation. I think there is no domain of legislation in which special legislation is more injurious and has more far-reaching, bad consequences than in the granting of property rights; and in property rights there is nothing more important nowadays than the great coal deposits of the country, in view of the fact that so many of them have been monopolized and the area of public lands has been so greatly reduced.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. POINDEXTER I do.

Mr. WALSH. I think everybody will agree in the main with what the Senator from Washington now says, but we ought to meet the situation. What would the Senator suggest as an appropriate means by which this company could provide itself with coal?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I would suggest that it avail itself of the general law.

Mr. WALSH. The general law denies to it the opportunity to appropriate any coal lands.

Mr. POINDEXTER. In what way?

Mr. WALSH. There is no general law that will permit it at all. It does not permit a corporation to appropriate coal lands.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It permits individuals and associations, and I am not sure that it does not permit corporations.

Mr. WALSH. I can assure the Senator that is not the case.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is perfectly feasible for the company to acquire the land from others who may acquire title. Or it may buy the coal from these individuals. There is nothing whatever to prevent it. If the general law is inadequate or unwise, as it undoubtedly is in some respects, it should be and it undoubtedly will be amended. Corporations undoubtedly will be permitted to lease coal lands under certain conditions; but if not, a special exception should not be made in this case.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I wish to say to the Senator from Washington, it seems to be perfectly evident that the joint resolution can not be disposed of to-night. I simply desire to ask the Senator if it will be agreeable to him to resume in the morning?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Entirely so.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I wish to have action on a conference report that I do not think will take five minutes, and then an executive session is desired, if the Senator will yield.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I will ask the Senator in charge of the joint resolution if he is willing to lay it aside temporarily.

Mr. MYERS. Right now, for a conference report?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. MYERS. I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution be laid aside temporarily without any prejudice for the purpose of allowing the Senator from Virginia to present a conference report.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be laid aside temporarily, but a conference report is always in order.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Virginia to present a conference report and then to move to go into executive session.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I will move an executive session as soon as we get through with the conference report. It is perfectly manifest that the joint resolution can not be finished to-night. I have talked with a number of Senators and I will say to the Senator from Montana that I am sure he will lose nothing by taking that course.

Mr. MYERS. After the conference report is agreed to I shall make no objection to an executive session.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I understood the Senator that way. It is simply a conference report on the urgent deficiency appropriation bill. I am sure it will take but a very few minutes to dispose of it.

Mr. MYERS. Very well.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the consideration of the conference report presented by the Senator from Virginia? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read the report.

The Secretary read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13612) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1914 and for prior years, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 27, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum named in said amendment insert the sum "$14,675"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 28, and agree to the same with amendments as follows: On page 27 of the bill, in line 16, strike out the sum "$6.89" and insert in lieu thereof the sum "$6.80," and, in line 18, strike out the sum "$64,925" and insert in lieu thereof the sum "$64,925.09"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 52, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: After the word "opening," in line 5 of said amendment, insert the words "under the direction of the Governor of the Panama Canal"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 53, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: After the word "construction," in line 4 of said amendment, insert the words "but not later than June 30, 1916"; and the Senate agree to the same.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, March 24, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Infinite Spirit, our Father, we bless Thee for our great and growing Republic, the foundations of which are laid in the inherent and therefore sacred rights of man, life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, and dedicated by our fathers to Thy service. Help us with patriotic zeal and religious fervor to support, sustain, and defend it, not our country right or wrong, but our country, that it may always be right and thus laud and magnify Thy holy name.

Our fathers' God, to Thee,
Author of liberty,
To Thee we sing.
Long may our land be bright
With freedom's holy light;
Protect us by Thy might,
Great God our King.

For humanity's sake, for Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MANUAL AND DIGEST.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I present the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. Is it privileged?

Mr. HENRY. I ask unanimous consent for its consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to consider the resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 450.

Resolved, That there be printed 2,000 copies of the Digest and Manual of the Rules and Practice of the House of Representatives for the second session of the Sixty-third Congress, the same to be bound and distributed under the direction of the Clerk and Doorkeeper of the House.

Mr. MANN. That is the usual resolution?

Mr. HENRY. That is the usual resolution, the one we have in every Congress.

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, may I inquire of the gentleman if this has been submitted to the chairman of the Committee on Printing?

Mr. HENRY. Oh, no. It has always been done in this way.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it not customary to have this resolution reported by the chairman of the Committee on Printing? Is it customary to have a Member present a resolution to have this allotted number printed?

Mr. HENRY. From the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

RIVERS AND HARBORS.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 13811, the river and harbor appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 13811) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, with Mr. ALEXANDER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the river and harbor appropriation bill, and the Clerk will read.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, in view of the point of order made upon the amendment introduced by myself when the committee rose yesterday afternoon, and in view of the fact that I have reached the conclusion that the point of order is well taken, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will read.

Mr. WILSON of Florida. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WILSON of Florida. Would it be in order now to strike out the last word of the last paragraph?

The CHAIRMAN. It would.

Mr. WILSON of Florida. Then I move to strike out the last word.

Yesterday, Mr. Chairman, in discussing the question of these canals, it was stated by some gentlemen on the committee that the importance of Link No. 5 was greater than the importance of Link No. 4, which is the link connecting Pensacola Bay with Mobile Bay. And it was stated upon the ground that the commerce, for the purpose of bringing in coal and other commercial products, warranted it. I wish to state, Mr. Chairman, that I can not let that statement go unchallenged, because the Pensacola Harbor is much superior to any harbor on the Gulf coast that would be benefited by these canals. As I stated yesterday, we have many ocean-going vessels carrying traffic, commerce from Europe and to Europe and to and from South American ports. I can not state the importance of the harbor better than is stated in a letter written by the president of the Pensacola Commercial Association in answer to a criticism made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] when the question of navy yards was being discussed. I will insert the article containing the letter, which appeared in the Pensacola Journal of August 19, 1913.

[Army and Navy Journal.]

In a letter replying to some remarks of Congressman BRITTEN and setting forth the advantages of Pensacola, Fla., as the site for a navy yard, C. E. Dobson, president of the Pensacola Commercial Association, tells us that "this city of Pensacola, of 23,000 people, lies almost due south of Chicago, 911 miles distant by rail. It has the best harbor on the Gulf of Mexico, and one of the best in the United States. The harbor is landlocked, has a minimum depth of 32 feet of water in the channel at the lowest tide, 19 square miles of anchorage of over 30 feet depth, 7 square miles of over 35 feet depth. The naval reservation, Government owned, consists of over 1,400 acres, about 2 miles inside the harbor, with 25 to 40 feet of water alongside the wharves at the navy yard. A navy yard has been maintained here since 1836, with alternating periods of activity and quietude. It was Farragut's headquarters for operations in the Gulf. It contains some modern buildings, has pleasant quarters, and an excellent all-the-year-round climate. The yard proper, 80 acres in extent, is surrounded by a high brick wall and is covered by a beautiful live-oak grove. It is connected with Pensacola by a good public road and an electric car line, each about 7 miles long. By water the distance is about 5 miles." Mr. Dobson contends that "much talk as to consolidation, etc., boiled down, resolves itself into the convincing argument that because the Government has neglected this section it should continue to do so. These logicians argue that the Gulf yards make a poor showing for the money invested, because they have done so little work, the reason being that the Government wouldn't send them any, and because they make a poor showing they should be abolished."

I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Yazoo River, Miss.: For maintenance of improvement of mouth of Yazoo River, $10,000. The sums herein and hereafter appropriated for such maintenance, together with any unexpended balance of appropriations heretofore made, shall be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 20, between lines 20 and 21, by adding a new paragraph, as follows:

"Improving harbor at Vicksburg, Miss., in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 667, Sixty-third Congress, second session, and subject to the conditions therein stated, $125,000."

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman and gentleman, I do not come before you to-day asking for any improvements that will increase the commerce of the city of Vicksburg or of that section. I do not come here asking you for anything along that line, but I come here simply asking you to right a wrong, to repair an injury, and to make reparation for an act that the Federal Government itself inflicted upon the harbor at Vicksburg.

Now, if you will bear with me a moment, I will explain how this damage came about. There is a canal about 6 miles in length, coming down in front of the city of Vicksburg and entering the Mississippi River. Through that canal come the waters of the Yazoo River and its tributaries—over 800 miles of navigable streams. During the overflows of 1911 and 1912 crevasses occurred in the levees from 75 to 100 miles above the city of Vicksburg. Just opposite the mouth of that canal and in front of the city of Vicksburg there is a levee which was built by the Federal Government, not a protection levee, not a levee to keep the water off of anybody, but a levee for the purpose of impounding the waters of that canal, for the twofold purpose, first, of having plenty of water there at the mouth of the canal, and, second, to make such a current and so impound those waters that there will be a scouring which will keep the mouth of that canal open.

Now, when the waters from those 800 miles of navigable streams and the rushing torrents from the open crevasses in the levees of the Mississippi River, which have broken, came through there those waters were impounded between the harbor of Vicksburg and that levee, and there has been a great and constant erosion. There is about $3,000,000 worth of property situated on those banks. That erosion has now gone up right within a few feet of some of the compresses, gins, and public warehouses that are situated there.

I presented this proposition to the committee last year, and on that occasion I was turned down. We had no report from the Board of Engineers. There were no estimates as to what this project would cost. My amendment was defeated. I recognized the force of this contention; I recognized, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] said the other day, that we can not make this bill on the floor of this House; that we have to depend upon the reports of the engineers, men who have skill, and men whose business it is to look into those subjects. The committee gave me a survey, and upon that survey I have a report of the Board of Engineers. I have a favorable report from the Acting Chief of Engineers. I have a favorable report from the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors. I have a favorable report from the Mississippi River Commission, asking that $125,000 be appropriated to be used in revetment work for the harbor of Vicksburg, based on the contingency that the citizens of Vicksburg put up $32,500 in order to create a drainage system, erect a levee, and give them the right of way; to put up $32,500, not to increase the commerce of the city of Vicksburg, not to put that city into the position it was in three years ago—because a great deal of our harbor has caved away and is now in the sea—but simply to put up $32,500 to help stop the damage which, according to this report, was inflicted by putting that levee across from the city of Vicksburg. Of course that levee will have to stay there and ought to stay there, and I would be opposed to having it removed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER] asks unanimous consent for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COLLIER. Now, Mr. Chairman, we have heard a good deal about commerce here and there and about making this appropriation and that one in the interest of future commerce. Here is commerce about to be destroyed. How much? We have various conflicting statements concerning various items in this bill about there not being commerce enough to justify an appropriation for the improvement of a waterway here or there for the purpose of increasing commerce. I am asking for an appropriation to prevent the destruction of commerce that already exists. According to the report of the Board of Engineers, which I hold in my hand, the annual commerce, as shown on June 30, 1913, for the Vicksburg port is 834,000 tons, amounting to the value of $33,000,000.

Now, in the 10-minute speech made the other day by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], in which he stated, and well stated, that a reduction of railroad rates would naturally follow river competition, I want to read to you something taken from the report of the Board of Engineers about the reduction of railroad rates which has resulted from that canal. The report says:

The effect of this project, in connection with the work performed in the Yazoo River and its tributaries, has been to reduce freight rates as follows: Cotton, 50 per cent; cotton seed, 33⅓ per cent; and grain and flour and meal and provisions from 33⅓ to 40 per cent.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I hold in my hand a report which came out during this Congress. It is from the Mississippi River Commission. It is the report of the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors. It is the report of the Chief of Engineers. I will read you what Col. Burr, Acting Chief of Engineers, says. He says:

After due consideration of the above-mentioned reports, I concur with the views of the Mississippi River Commission and the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, and therefore report that the improvement by the United States of the canal leading from Centennial Lake, Vicksburg, Miss., to the Mississippi River is deemed advisable to the extent of preventing the caving of the bank by the construction of a revetment at an estimated cost of $135,000, under the conditions of local cooperation specified above.

Those conditions were that the city of Vicksburg should do certain work costing $32,500, which we are perfectly willing to do.

Mr. Chairman, I contend that there is not a project, not a line, not a sentence, or a paragraph of that river and harbor bill presented before you to-day that has any more authority than the authority which I present to you here. On yesterday the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors [Mr. SPARKMAN] stated, in answer to a question by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR], that the committee did not have time to go into all these projects and had to take the approval of the engineers. Here is the approval of the Chief of Engineers. Here is the approval of the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors. Here is the approval of the Mississippi River Commission. We have not a project here that can wait until next year. Last year we waited, and during those 12 months we have seen our harbor going off into the sea. If we wait another 12 months, the question might be solved, perhaps, by the fact that we shall then not need any improvement, because there may be nothing left to improve.

Mr. Chairman, the people in the city of Vicksburg, the people who live on that harbor, are as much entitled to protection as those who live above the city of Vicksburg. Our people have been contributing of their own means, many of them, to help build the levees in other sections of our State, because many of them own land in the delta and because a great deal of their interests are in those sections. We are to-day appropriating in this bill millions of dollars, and properly appropriating them, to build up and strengthen levees, and under those circumstances it strikes me that it is only fair and just to the people whom I have the honor to represent that $125,000 should be appropriated to take care of work which, as I stated before, is necessitated by the damage caused by necessary work done by the Government, which the Mississippi Commission states was a damage probably not considered in the original project.

Mr. MADDEN. Was this canal built by the Government of the United States?

Mr. COLLIER. Yes; absolutely. This canal is under the control of the United States and under the control of the United States authorities.

Mr. SPARKMAN. If the gentleman will permit, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that a good deal of work has been done there that has not been done by the Government.

Mr. COLLIER. Yes; and I would like the gentleman to show me a river in Florida or anywhere else where the work of improvement has not been done by the Government.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes; I can do so. The St. Johns River is one. Those people have contributed about $3,000,000 for that improvement.

Mr. COLLIER. Well, those people are to be congratulated on their public spirit.

Mr. MADDEN. If the levee had not been constructed there, what would be the situation as to the harbor?

Mr. COLLIER. The levee simply impounds the water in case of overflow, and now the erosion has started. I want to be perfectly frank with the House and do not want to mislead anybody. The levee itself is a great betterment to the canal, and ought to be there and ought not to be removed. The levee is necessary in order to prevent a shifting bar from coming out of the mouth of that canal and closing up the navigability of 800 miles of river, going up nearly to the northern part of the State of Mississippi.

Mr. MADDEN. But the erosion is due to the fact that the levee is there, is it?

Mr. COLLIER. That is one of the causes. The erosion is due to the fact that when there is an overflow and high water by reason of gaps up above they will put from ten to fifty times more water into that canal than it was ever intended to hold. That is the reason.

Mr. EDWARDS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. COLLIER. With the greatest pleasure.

Mr. EDWARDS. I should like to ask the gentleman if he does not know, as a matter of fact, that this very project for which he is now speaking is provided for under the general provision for the Mississippi River, and that the Mississippi River Commission has the right to go ahead and do this work if it sees fit and proper to do it?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COLLIER. I ask a few minutes more.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER] be permitted to proceed for five minutes longer. He has been interrupted a good deal, and this is evidently a very meritorious project. I want him to have an opportunity to present it fully.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request that the time of the gentleman be extended five minutes?

There was no objection.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman, I am very glad to answer the question of the gentleman from Georgia. He says that under the general appropriation of $7,000,000, I believe it is, for the Mississippi River Commission, from the mouth of the river up to Rock Island, is it not——

Mr. EDWARDS. Up to Rock Island.

Mr. COLLIER. That under the general appropriation for the Mississippi River Commission from the mouth of the river up to Rock Island, this would come under that head. But this money is to be spent in the discretion of the Mississippi River Commission. If the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. EDWARDS] were to spend it, perhaps he would take care of Vicksburg Harbor. His construction of the language is all right, and I understand that the construction given by the chairman of the committee and another member of it, is the same; but unfortunately for me, and unfortunately for Vicksburg, while the construction of some of the members of this committee may be right, yet it does not get us anything, because I hold in my hand a letter from Col. Townsend, president of the Mississippi River Commission, in which he makes this statement, referring to a section where there is a survey and a special report to Congress. He refers to a section on page 52 of this bill, which, with the indulgence of the committee, I will read:

That the Government shall not be deemed to have entered upon any project for the improvement of any waterway or harbor mentioned in this act until funds for the commencement of the proposed work shall have been actually appropriated by law.

Now, I will read the same language from his letter to Gen. T. C. Catchings, of the city of Vicksburg, whom many of you know, a gentleman who many years served in this House with great distinction and was at one time chairman of the Rivers and Harbors Committee.

Col. Townsend, on January 15, 1914, in a letter to Gen. Catchings in reference to this very project, quoted from the bill the words I have just read you:

That the Government shall not be deemed to have entered upon any project for the improvement of any waterway or harbor mentioned in this act until funds for the commencement of the proposed work shall have been actually appropriated by law.

Now, in commenting on it, he concluded by stating:

My construction of the act is that the commission is directed to expend $10,000—

You will find that expenditure in the paragraph just above the new paragraph I wish to add—or so much thereof as may be necessary, in the maintenance of Vicksburg Harbor, make a survey, and report on the further needs of the harbor—

And then what? Go on and do the work? No—and then await congressional approval of the report.

Now, we have not the congressional approval of this report. As far as the river and harbor bill is written, it is just like it was a year ago, when they said it could not be done; so what good is this report if we do not have the approval of it by Congress? And this report has been ignored by the Rivers and Harbors Committee.

Mr. EDWARDS. Will the gentleman yield further now?

Mr. COLLIER. I do.

Mr. EDWARDS. I beg to differ with the gentleman, and the law differs with him also in his position. The law was enacted in 1913, and here is the language. I hope the gentleman will yield long enough for me to read this.

Mr. COLLIER. I take pleasure in yielding.

Mr. EDWARDS. Relating to the provision for the Mississippi River:

Provided further, That the watercourses connected with said river and the harbors upon it now under the control of the Mississippi River Commission and under improvement, together with the mouth of the Yazoo River and harbor at Vicksburg, Miss., which, with any unexpended balance, are hereby transferred to and placed under the control and jurisdiction of such commission.

There is not any doubt about it. There can be no doubt about it; and to give this special privilege to Vicksburg would simply establish a precedent that would open up the doors to applications for every point on the Mississippi River, and Congress will be asked to change this law in many particulars if this amendment carries.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDWARDS. Here is my friend Mr. MCKELLAR, who will have a provision of the same kind.

Mr. COLLIER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. EDWARDS] has read with great glee a provision that I had put in the river and harbor bill last year, so of course I know something about it.

Mr. EDWARDS. Yes; we did it to satisfy the gentleman.

Mr. COLLIER. In 1913 that was the best I could get. But the gentleman fails to make this distinction, which Col. Townsend makes, that when there has been a special survey of a special project and a special report on that special project, then it is up to Congress to say whether or not that project ought to be improved or not. Now, the gentleman's construction may be right, but the trouble is that the gentleman from Georgia is not on the Mississippi River Commission, and he does not pass on this proposition. That is my trouble on that line.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I do not think I am asking anything unusual. I do not think I am asking for anything that is not fair and not just. Time and again, in justifying every project that they have brought here they have told you that they did it by reason of their reliance on the report of the engineers on river and harbor work. I have the report of the Chief of Engineers, I have the report of the Board of Engineers, and I have the report of the Mississippi River Commission, all of them suggesting that this work be done, and I do not see why the committee should make fish of one and flesh of another. I ask the gentlemen of this Committee of the Whole to do what I consider simple justice and repair an injury. I ask the gentlemen of this House to do what I consider simple justice. We are not asking for improvements; we are asking only that you stop the damage that you are inflicting upon us day by day by your own act. [Applause.]

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I suppose everyone who has followed the proceedings so far as we have gone with this bill has the impression that the Committee on Rivers and Harbors has endeavored to act fairly toward each project that came before it, and that if any project has been left out that the committee itself thought it had good reason for its action. There are several reasons why this item should not go in the bill, why this amendment should not prevail. One is that it is not at all necessary to make the appropriation.

This matter is under the jurisdiction of the Mississippi River Commission, which has full power to deal with the proposition and to make the improvement if it sees proper to make it. I may add that in a conversation I had with a member of the commission within the last two weeks I was told by him that there was no earthly reason for taking care of it in this measure; that the commission could make the improvement. Although there was no promise, I got the impression that the probabilities were that the commission would take care of it.

Mr. COLLIER. This has been going on now for two years, and it has been hitting us up pretty lively. Would the gentleman agree to an amendment specifically stating that this should be done?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I would do anything consistent with my idea of what is proper to accommodate the gentleman; there is no disposition to discriminate against him; but if we adopt his amendment we will be departing from a well-established rule of the committee that we have been following for some time. When I first became a member of the River and Harbor Committee it was quite customary to make diversions of sums appropriated for the Mississippi River, and particularly for the lower regions. Each bill perhaps would carry an item, sometimes two or three, diverting money from the lump sum appropriated to this or that place. Considering that a bad practice, we went to work to get away from it, which we have done; so that in the last several bills there have been no such diversions or special appropriations, I believe, for that river.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. Instead of departing from the custom, is it not a fact that the last bill carried a similar appropriation for Helena, Ark., and did not the gentleman agree to it?

Mr. SPARKMAN. That matter was put on in the Senate. Things go on in the Senate that we would not adopt in the House, and we sometimes find ourselves in a position where we have to let them stand. That river and harbor bill probably could not have become a law if that item had not gone in. It was passed at a short session, when we had but little time.

Mr. McKELLAR. But it did go in, and the House agreed to it.

Mr. MURDOCK. How much is the item for Helena, Ark.?

Mr. McKELLAR. One hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. SPARKMAN. It was much larger than it ought to have been. Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman stated correctly a while ago that this harbor at Vicksburg was placed under the jurisdiction of the Mississippi River Commission in the last river and harbor bill. It was placed there at the request of the gentleman himself. Why did he want it done? Simply that the Mississippi River Commission could take care of it. They had not been doing it before. He and Gen. Catchings and, I think, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS], came to the committee room. Gen. Catchings had been a Member of this House and a former member of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. He came before the committee or before me with an amendment already drawn, I think he said by himself, placing that harbor under the jurisdiction of the Mississippi River Commission, and asked us to take care of it in that way. We complied, and placed it under the jurisdiction of the commission. The bill went over to the Senate, where the provision for the survey was placed in it. I do not think it came from our committee. At least, that is my recollection. The gentleman intimates that he had it inserted. I think that is a legitimate inference from his remarks.

Mr. COLLIER. The gentleman is mistaken; I put in the survey myself, and it was put in in the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Florida has expired.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida asks that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SPARKMAN. This is a very important matter, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House.

Mr. COLLIER. I think so, too.

Mr. SPARKMAN. If the House permits this amendment to go into the bill we will be throwing the doors wide open for the admission of all kinds of projects, so that anything in the future can go into the river and harbor bills, and the committee will never know how to act.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. Would that be true if this item went on in the Senate, as it is very likely to do?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Well, this is the long session.

Mr. MURDOCK. The Helena, Ark., item went on in the Senate.

Mr. SPARKMAN. That was at a short session. There would be quite a fight now before the conferees would yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Why has not the House the right to do what it thinks right? Has it not more authority than the Mississippi River Commission? Is it not over and above it?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes; we can do that; we can place anything in the bill, or the House can defeat the bill if it pleases.

Mr. COLLIER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes.

Mr. COLLIER. Did not the Mississippi River Commission ask Congress to make a special appropriation for the Vicksburg Harbor?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I do not know.

Mr. COLLIER. The gentleman has the report right at his hand.

Mr. SPARKMAN. The survey reads as follows:

Canal leading from Centennial Lake, Vicksburg, Miss., to the Mississippi River, with a view to the preservation of the channel.

Now what did the Mississippi River Commission do? They ignored the order we had given them to report a project for the preservation of the channel. Here is what they say: That the investigations of the Mississippi River Commission elicited the information that the improvement desired in connection with the item of law providing for preliminary examination of the canal leading from Centennial Lake to Vicksburg, Miss., to the Mississippi River, with a view to the preservation of the channel, was the protection of the caving bank in front of the city of Vicksburg, along a portion of the canal constructed some years ago as the new outlet or mouth of the Yazoo River.

In other words, while we put up to them the proposition to report upon a project for the improvement of the channel, in the interest of navigation, they tell us that what the people there want is protection of private property or the banks, in the interest of private property, and make report accordingly. They say:

A public hearing was held at Vicksburg. The improvement desired is the protection of the banks of the canal where caving threatens the destruction of valuable private property and also the transfer tracks and incline of the Alabama & Vicksburg Railway, from which large quantities of freight are transferred across the Mississippi River to and from the Louisiana shore. Copies of the papers presented are appended.

So it would seem that the work is for the benefit of private property owners and a railroad that runs along there. Now, so far as I am concerned, Mr. Chairman, I have no fight to make on the railroads. Because a railroad happens to be there would not deter me if I thought it was proper and right to adopt the project and make the appropriation.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Why should we let down the bars and open the doors solely for the purpose of protecting private property when no navigation interests, it would appear, are to be considered, especially as the Mississippi River Commission has the jurisdiction and the power to take care of it? We have given them $7,000,000 in this bill to do just that class of work, but the appropriation is coupled with the proviso that the money must be expended in the interest of navigation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Florida has expired.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. It is rather hard to understand just what is the view of the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN] in this matter. He starts out with the proposition that this appropriation was embodied in the total appropriation carried for the Mississippi River, and that under the provisions of the bill the Mississippi River Commission now has authority to spend that money, but when later he takes a different view and says that the work is not in the interest of navigation, but that it is in the interest of some railroads down there that want the work done, I do not know what his position is. May I inquire of the gentleman, is it a fact that he does not think the work ought to be done, or is it that he thinks the appropriation is carried in the total appropriation carried for the Mississippi River? If he argues the first proposition, let us see. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. EDWARDS] says that in the last river and harbor act this appropriation was specifically stated in the appropriation carried under the general Mississippi River item, because he said that item in that bill embodied this wording:

Provided further, That the water courses connected with said river and the harbors upon it now under the control of the Mississippi River Commission and under improvement, together with the mouth of the Yazoo River and the harbor at Vicksburg, Miss.—

And so forth.

Specifically stating it in that law. I ask the committee if under the river and harbor bill last year in an appropriation carried for the Mississippi River it specifically stated that so much of the appropriation should be carried for this particular work, and the Mississippi River Commission said that under the authority of that bill they had no right to expend that money. Now I ask the committee how would the Mississippi River Commission have authority to expend this $125,000 under the bill we are considering when that specific enumeration is left out? Under this appropriation in this bill carried for the Mississippi River you leave out the specific item in respect to the mouth of the Yazoo River and the Vicksburg Harbor.

Mr. SPARKMAN. But the gentleman is mistaken abo t that. The harbor is still under the jurisdiction of the Mississippi River Commission, and I am inclined to believe, though that cuts no figure here, that the mouth of the Yazoo is also. I know the intention was to cut the mouth of the Yazoo River out of this bill, but not the harbor.

Mr. HARRISON. I think the gentleman is wrong about that, because a careful reading of the bill says so. Let me read where in the bill last year it enumerated the specific item of improvement for the mouth of the Yazoo River and the Vicksburg Harbor under this same provision:

Provided further, That the watercourses connected with said river and the harbors upon it, now under the control of the Mississippi River Commission, and under improvement, together with the mouth of the Yazoo River and harbor of Vicksburg, Miss., which, with any unexpended balance, are hereby transferred to and placed under the control and jurisdiction of, such commission—

And so forth.

And that specific enumeration is left out of the appropriation bill now under discussion. Under what rule of reason would you think that if in the last river and harbor bill, under this provision, the Mississippi River Commission had jurisdiction to improve the mouth of the Yazoo River and Vicksburg Harbor, but even though with the item specifically enumerated the Mississippi River Commission thought they did not have authority under the provisions of that bill to do the work, and yet would argue that the Mississippi River Commission, when that provision is left out of this bill, have authority to do this work at Vicksburg?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I say, in my judgment, it was not left out. It was not necessary to reiterate the language in this bill, because having been once placed under the jurisdiction of the commission, unless we repeal the law, it is still there.

Mr. HARRISON. If the gentleman will read his two bills, he will find out that I am exactly correct.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Oh, I have read it carefully several times.

Mr. HARRISON. I know, and I appreciate the committee has dealt sincerely with this, as it has with all other matters coming before it, but in this instance the committee has inadvertently left this item out. Here is a case that ought to appeal to the membership of this House—a condition that is brought about through the improvement undertaken by the Federal Government by the construction of a levee there that canalized and brought these waters that heretofore had not affected the banks at Vicksburg, and because of the improvement undertaken by the Federal Government these waters have been dammed up against the banks to that extent that it has caused this scouring and the need for this revetment work. If there is a case that ought to appeal to this committee, it is this appropriation for the Vicksburg Harbor. The gentleman from Vicksburg has done everything in his power to bring it about. He has gone to the proper channel, and he has asked for a survey. It went through. He got a favorable report from the Mississippi River Commission; he got a favorable report from the district engineers; he got a favorable report from the River and Harbor Board of Army Engineers; and then he came before you and asked for this appropriation. What more could he have done? If there is any doubt as to the expenditure of this money or the authority of the Mississippi River Commission to expend this money, then I submit you ought to remove that doubt, right that wrong, and embody it in this bill. The only difference, apparently, between a majority of your committee and the Mississippi River Commission is the authority of the commission to spend this money on this improvement. Both think it ought to be done.

Mr. HELM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. HELM. If any other power than the Federal Government had done what is said to have been done here, would not a suit for damages lie against the corporation, company, or whatever it was?

Mr. HARRISON. I have no doubt about that. I think so. I think I have said all I care to say. I hope the amendment will prevail.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Chairman, I rise to speak in opposition to the motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] asked to be recognized in opposition.

Mr. EDWARDS. Will the gentleman yield to me?

The CHAIRMAN. Both are members of the committee.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I want to say at the outset that if I have a friend in the House I think that friend is Mr. COLLIER. He is not a member of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, but he is a member of the powerful Ways and Means Committee that has to do with the making up of all the other committees of the House. I want to say of my friend Mr. COLLIER that it is to his credit that he has been very diligent in regard to this matter that no doubt so vitally affects his people. It is not a question of opposition to the project or as to whether or not we think it ought to be made. But it is a question of establishing a precedent that will "hamstring" and "throttle" the work of the great Mississippi River Commission. If there is any body of gentlemen in this House who ought to stand loyal to the river and harbor bill and to river and harbor improvement, those who come from the Mississippi Valley should.

Mr. COLLIER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDWARDS. Not just now; I will yield a little later. This bill carries, and not with the approval of myself and other members of the committee, $7,000,000 for the improvement of the Mississippi River. The law of 1913 puts this proposition, as it puts the proposition of Mr. MCKELLAR, of Memphis, Tenn., and other propositions along the Mississippi River under the jurisdiction of the Mississippi River Commission.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDWARDS. Not just now. Are we, by setting an unwise precedent to-day, going to start a movement that will destroy the work of the Mississippi River Commission? I tell you, gentlemen, I can hardly believe my friend understands what the full effect of this amendment, if adopted, will be. His fight should be carried, not here on the floor of this House, but he should go with it to the Mississippi River Commission, to the commission that has the matter in charge, and present his case there——

Mr. COLLIER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDWARDS. And perhaps he can convince them that the work ought to be done.

Mr. COLLIER. If the gentleman does not want to yield, all right.

Mr. EDWARDS. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. COLLIER. I want to say the gentleman misunderstands the situation when he talks about hampering the work of the Mississippi River Commission. This is asking for the same thing that the Mississippi River Commission asked for, a special appropriation. Does not the gentleman find on reading the report that the Mississippi River Commission asked this be made in a special appropriation, and yet the gentleman talks about destroying the work of that commission.

Mr. EDWARDS. I will say in reply to the gentleman, sometimes we can not see things in the same light. Gentlemen, there has been talk about "pork barrel" by gentlemen on the floor of this House and by certain "demagogues" throughout the country which has appeared in the papers. If some people could suck as hard as they blow, like my friend from Wisconsin, for instance, we could no doubt do away with Government dredges. [Laughter.] If we want to get away from the "pork barrel," why then stand by the committee, stand by the annual bill; if you want to go back to the "pork-barrel" proposition and hamper the work of the Mississippi River Commission and the engineers, then vote for these specific items and destroy the work of the commission, destroy the great progressive work of the improvement of the rivers and harbors of this country, the improvement of which reduces freight rates to the people.

As I stated at the outset, if there are any men in this House who ought to stand firmly by river and harbor improvements of this country, those who come from the great Mississippi Valley should do so. Now, my friends, in conclusion I want to read this. It is not what I might do if I were to consult my personal wishes, for then, perhaps, I would be willing to vote for my friend COLLIER's proposition. It is not that. I wish to read to the committee, on page 5, what the engineers say on this proposition.

Mr. FREAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDWARDS. Not just now.

Mr. FREAR. I want to say——

Mr. EDWARDS. Not just now, please. The engineers, on page 5 of the report concerning this matter, say:

A public hearing was held at Vicksburg. The improvement desired is the protection of the banks of the canal where caving threatens the destruction of valuable private property and also the transfer tracks and incline of the Alabama & Vicksburg Railway, from which large quantities of freight are transferred across the Mississippi River to and from the Louisiana shore.

Gentlemen, whenever you get away from the proposition of expending money for navigation and go to expending it for the protection of private property, as indicated by this report, you are destroying the river and harbor work.

The CHAIRMAN. All debate on this amendment has expired.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I hope the members of the committee will understand the situation as far as this proposed amendment is concerned. We have allowed the Mississippi River Commission the sum of $7,000,000. Now, if that commission thinks that this proposition is worthy of improvement, they have the authority and the money to make the expenditure for it.

The charge has been made here on the floor of this House time and again that this was a "pork-barrel" bill, and yet here is a proposition that is a "pork-barrel" proposition—the very thing that we have been condemned for—and if you carry this amendment you take away from the Mississippi River Commission the discretion as to how that $7,000,000 shall be expended, and you leave it to different gentlemen to come here and get it expended in their communities, regardless of the merits of the project. We have several propositions of that character; and I say to the men who are the friends of the Mississippi River project that they are making a most serious mistake if they vote in this amendment.

Mr. BARTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I can not yield now.

I was one member of the committee who believed we were exceedingly liberal when we gave the Mississippi River Commission $7,000,000. We gave them $1,000,000 more than we did before, and I think that we gave them too much; and now I am astounded that the friends of the Mississippi River should come in here after they have received $1,000,000 more, in my judgment, than they should have received, and demand that they have an additional appropriation. If you do this, you will certainly make it a "pork-barrel" proposition. You may as well abolish the Mississippi River Commission. Instead of giving that great commission the authority as to where to expend that money, leaving the discretion to them, you turn it over and leave it to the Members of this House that have the influence to amend this bill.

Let me call your attention to this fact, that the report says this expenditure is not necessary in the interest of navigation. And I warn the people of this country as to where that would lead. Once commence improving and spending money to protect from overflow, when the interest of navigation is not involved, and it will take countless millions. The proposed amendment violates the rule that the Rivers and Harbors Committee has always followed. They are coming in here now and demanding that we make an appropriation, not in the interest of navigation, but to protect levees and to protect canals, and if you once embark upon that there will be no end to it. And to my friends along the Mississippi River, with whom I have always voted and worked, I give this warning. I want you and other men who live along the Mississippi River to remember that the majority of the people of this country live along the two coasts and around the Great Lakes, and not in the Mississippi Valley. You let the rest of the people of this country believe that you are trying to get into the National Treasury and secure money for other purposes than to protect the navigation of the river, and you will find that it will lead to embarrassment in securing merited improvements. When you get $7,000,000 a year other portions of the country will demand that they be equally treated, if you are going to make appropriations to protect surrounding country from overflow. And the very men who are urging this are perpetrating an injury upon their own section of the country. I hope this committee will not violate the long-established rule of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and that they will not practically abolish the Mississippi River Commission and turn this bill into what it has been charged to be, a real "pork-barrel" bill, with the appropriations resting entirely upon the influence of Members of Congress.

One of the members of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors urged this appropriation, and it was voted down; and yet in the face of all the charges that these appropriations are made for the members of the committee we have the attempt made here to give an appropriation that the committee itself would not give to one of its oldest members. [Applause.]

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY]. As a friend of the Mississippi River and of the Mississippi Valley, the words of the gentleman from the Pacific coast have no terrors for me. I propose to stand for the Mississippi Valley and for the Mississippi River and its tributaries. [Applause.] And I do not believe that by reason of any threat he may make upon the floor of this House, that because we believe that in voting for an appropriation to right a wrong that has been done by the National Government, the balance of the country is to punish us by saying we shall not have any more appropriation for the Mississippi River.

Mr. HARDWICK. May I ask the gentleman if he is willing to apply that same doctrine to every other river in this country?

Mr. FOSTER. What is that?

Mr. HARDWICK. Of appropriating for flood protection.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The gentleman illustrates what I say.

Mr. FOSTER. We are appropriating money principally for the Mississippi River in the interests of navigation.

Mr. HARDWICK. You are?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, sir; that is the theory upon which the money is appropriated.

Mr. HARDWICK. In other rivers, where the same contention is made, will the gentleman stand by his doctrine there?

Mr. FOSTER. I will say to the gentleman from Georgia that the three great political parties in this country have stood for this policy in reference to the Mississippi River.

Mr. HARDWICK. But not for that alone.

Mr. FOSTER. And I believe the great majority of our citizens stand upon the proposition to take care of this great problem of the Mississippi River. As for the problem at Vicksburg, it has been shown that this matter can not be taken up by the Mississippi River Commission. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER] quotes Col. Townsend as saying that after the proposition was specifically arranged by survey it could not then be taken up by the commission, but must first be acted on by Congress.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Let me say to the gentleman that I had a conversation with Col. Townsend on that subject which I do not care to repeat, but another member of the commission did say he was in favor of it. And perhaps I ought not to say that. Anyhow, he did say they had the power and would take care of that appropriation, and I have no doubt they will.

Mr. FOSTER. I do believe, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER] has a meritorious proposition, and I do not care so much for a precedent. If it is right to put it in, I am in favor of putting it in; and if another Member comes along with a proposition that is not right or meritorious, it ought not to go in the bill. This thing of always standing for a precedent, regardless of conditions and circumstances, makes a man tired who wants to do business in the right way. If another proposition comes in, stand for it if it is right, and if it is not, vote it down. [Applause.]

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, one moment before the gentleman begins. I want to give opportunity for all reasonable discussion, but I would like to ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in seven minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN] asks unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in seven minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARDWICK. I have five minutes, have I not, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. I want to say this, Mr. Chairman, in answer to the remarks of the gentleman who last addressed the committee. I want to say to him and to the friends of the Mississippi Valley improvement that if they think for a moment that because a great national calamity called attention to their case and attracted attention to the trouble they have had in the Mississippi Valley and with the Mississippi River they can apply a doctrine partially and deny its application to the balance of this country they are the worst mistaken men that ever trod this floor. [Applause.] If they think they can have levee protection and flood protection in the Mississippi River Valley and nowhere else, when conditions are the same in other parts of the country and on other rivers, and when the interests of navigation demand that other rivers and other sections have this protection as well as the Mississippi River, then I think they but little understand the spirit of impartial fairness that pervades this House. [Applause.]

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Can the gentleman name any other river in the United States that has the same problem that the Mississippi River has?

Mr. HARDWICK. I can. It is the Savannah River in Georgia. [Applause.]

Mr. BARKLEY. Does the Savannah River drain one-third of the Republic?

Mr. HARDWICK. No; but it drains five great States of the Union and——

Mr. BARKLEY. The Mississippi River drains 25 States.

Mr. HARDWICK. You have had sixty-two times as much money as we ask for and you have not as strong a case along the lines of aiding navigation as we have. I want to warn these gentlemen now that, so far as I am concerned, I have voted my last time for any sort of proposition that deals with a particular problem in a different spirit and from a different angle from the spirit and the angle with which other problems affecting other rivers and other States and other sections of this country are dealt with.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] and no other gentleman need for a moment think that other rivers and sections of this country are going to stand for a different application of the doctrine that is applied to the Mississippi. Other sections of the country will demand the same treatment where the principles involved are identical and where the conditions are the same. I want to say now that they do not make any headway over there, because when they stand up and insist that, although the Mississippi River has already had $31,500,000 for levees under the thin disguise of aiding and promoting navigation, they are going to continue to get this sort of aid themselves from the Federal Treasury while other sections are not receiving the same treatment and that doctrine is not applied to anybody else.

Now, gentlemen, I do not believe that in this House or in the other House or before the American people you can stand for such a proposition. If you are going to have protection from floods and receive your appropriations therefor from the Federal Treasury, we must have them made impartially, and when the time comes to finally vote on this proposition I think our friends who live in the Mississippi Valley will find that we also must have some help, or their boat will go down in the struggle. [Applause.]

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, how much time remains?

The CHAIRMAN. Five minutes.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURGESS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURGESS] is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Chairman, this is quite a serious proposition. I am a friend of the Mississippi Valley and of the Mississippi Congressmen, personally and otherwise, and yet I am much opposed to this amendment.

They have got all they ought to want in having the improvements of the Mississippi River placed under the control of the Mississippi River Commission. We have given them as much as they ought to want—to wit, $7,000,000—and they ought to go to that commission for their river and harbor appropriations connected with the Mississippi River, and not come here and ask you to engraft upon this bill a proposition which will open the floodgates for everybody else on any other river.

Here is Memphis, represented by friend MCKELLAR, a nice, clever fellow. I am his friend, and I am the friend of his enterprise. He will be clamoring next for us to improve the harbor at Memphis; and so it will go on and on.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURGESS. Now, you talk about the river and harbor bill being a pork-barrel proposition. That seems to be a popular misapprehension. I have stood for 10 years, since I have been a member of that committee, for making appropriations in accordance with precedent and in favor of exercising care in the expenditure of Federal money for the improvement of rivers and harbors.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURGESS. Yes.

Mr. MCKELLAR. If Memphis has a meritorious case, why should not this House hear that meritorious case?

Mr. BURGESS. We ought to abolish the Mississippi River Commission and take back the $7,000,000, and then I will consider your project. [Laughter.] Are you in favor of that?

Mr. MCKELLAR. No.

Mr. BURGESS. That is a complete answer.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Not at all, because the Mississippi River Commission has never in its history done anything for Memphis.

Mr. BURGESS. That may be a fault to find with the Mississippi River Commission.

Mr. MCKELLAR. It is certainly a fault that I find with it.

Mr. BURGESS. We have appropriated $7,000,000 for the Mississippi River Commission to take care of the Mississippi River, and these Mississippi men who are urging this amount are standing in the light of their own constituents. That is what they are doing. They will break down this bill; and then, I ask you, what will become of the Mississippi River Commission?

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chariman, I will detain the House but two minutes. I want to say, first, in answer to the distinguished chairman of the committee [Mr. SPARKMAN], who tried to prejudice this case by saying that this amendment is in the interest of a railroad company. It is perfectly true that a railroad runs to the river at that point, just as a railroad extends to the river at every point that is big enough to have a railroad. I am taking this from the testimony of the mayor of Vicksburg, Col. J. J. Hayes, that there are 25 different owners of property, which property is worth between two and three million dollars, affected by this amendment. There is one warehouse alone worth $150,000. There are, in addition to railroad property, grain and grocery warehouses, cotton-oil mills, two cotton compresses, and other buildings. Those are some of the pieces of property that are involved. I know that these buildings are in danger, because I live there and have seen the condition for myself.

In answer to the charge that gentlemen have made that this is breaking up the work of the Mississippi River Commission by making a special appropriation, here is what the Mississippi River Commission says. In order to make it short I will read from the report of the board of engineers under date of December 16, 1913. This is their report on it:

> The Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors concurs in the views and recommendations of the Mississippi River Commission. If the work be authorized by Congress, the entire sum—$125,000—should be provided in a single appropriation, to be expended under the Mississippi River Commission, subject to the conditions above outlined by them.

And the Acting Chief of Engineers of the United States Army, in putting his approval on it, winds up his statement in one line, as follows:

> The full amount of the estimate should be permitted in one appropriation.

That is signed by Col. Burr, Acting Chief of Engineers. And yet my good friend, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. EDWARDS], and my good friend, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURGESS], and my good friend from the State of Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY], tell you that this amendment will destroy the Mississippi River Commission, when I am asking Congress to do what the Mississippi River Commission asked and doubtless expected the Committee on Rivers and Harbors to do. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired. Without objection the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. COLLIER. I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 86, noes 61.

The announcement of the result was received with applause.

Mr. SPARKMAN and Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chairman appointed Mr. SPARKMAN and Mr. COLLIER.

The committee again divided; and there were—ayes 74, noes 62.

Accordingly the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, is it necessary to give notice now of a separate vote in the House on this proposition?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Improving Bayous Bartholomew, Macon, D'Arbonne, and Corney, and Boeuf and Tensas Rivers, La.: For maintenance, $16,000.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Page 31, between lines 17 and 18, insert:
> "Improving Sabine River, La., $30,000, to be used in constructing a suitable snag boat and operating it for a period of one year, and continuing the work thereafter so long as sufficient revenue is derived from the sale of logs to pay for the operation of the plant; the logs and timber to be taken out of the river and to become the property of the United States and sold, the proceeds to go to the credit of the improvement; notice to be given pursuant to section 19 of an act making appropriation for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works in rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1899."

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, in speaking to this amendment I wish, in the beginning, to disavow any criticism of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors for not reporting this provision in their bill. The facts are that in December the members of the House of Representatives of the State of Louisiana along the line of the Sabine River, together with the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] and the Member from Texas on the Sabine River [Mr. DIES], appeared before the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors and presented this question, with a statement of the facts; and after a careful presentation of all the facts in the case they agreed that it was advisable and proper that the logs which had been sunken in the bottom of the Sabine River for years past, impeding and almost entirely blocking the navigation of the river, should be removed. There are estimated to be $500,000 worth of valuable logs in the bottom of the Sabine River, which have accumulated there from year to year from the rafts which have been floated down the river to supply the sawmills below. The Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors reported favorably upon this project, but their report was not printed so as to be accessible to the Members of the House of Representatives who represent the districts bordering on that river. That report was not received from the Printing Office in such form as to enable them to present the matter properly before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and on that account the project was not provided for in this bill.

I have no idea that any member of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors will for a moment think of opposing this amendment. It only asks for $30,000, and not one dollar of that sum is intended to be used for the purpose of doing the actual work in the river, but it is asked simply for the purpose of providing a snag boat. The sawmill men in that vicinity want the use of these logs. Most of the mill proprietors who have brought these logs down from time to time have moved away and abandoned them. The only proposition is that this snag boat shall be used for the purpose of digging out these logs, and that the logs themselves after being taken out of the river shall be sold to pay the expense of the work. It is provided that the expense of the work shall be paid by the money received from the sale of the logs.

To substantiate the statement I have made I present here and ask particular attention of the members of the committee to the reading from document No. 668 a letter of the Secretary of War relative to this project, in which he uses the language that I have used in this amendment:

After due consideration of the above-mentioned reports I concur with the views of the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, and therefore report that, subject to the enactment of legislation as recommended by the board, the improvement by the United States of Sabine River is deemed advisable to the extent of constructing a suitable snag boat and operating it for a period of one year, at an estimated cost of $30,000, and continuing the work thereafter so long as sufficient revenue is derived from the sale of logs to pay for the operation of the plant. The full amount of the above estimate should be provided in one appropriation.

EDW. BURR.
Colonel Corps of Engineers, Acting Chief of Engineers.

The legal provision they seek to have enacted in conjunction with the appropriation is stated in section 3, above.

The board recommends "that Congress enact such legislation as may be necessary to provide that all sunken logs and timber taken by the United States, after due notice, from any river bed in the process of clearing it for navigation shall become the property of the United States, subject to sale, and that the proceeds of sale shall go to the credit of the improvement."

That refers back to an enactment in 1899. The river and harbor bill of that year provided——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Louisiana has expired.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Louisiana may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Louisiana may have five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WATKINS. I do not think it is necessary, Mr. Chairman, for me to occupy any more time on this, for I feel satisfied that the chairman of the committee will not oppose it.

Mr. SPARKMAN. The gentleman had better not rely upon that.

Mr. WATKINS. Then, Mr. Chairman, I will take the time. In the river and harbor bill of 1899 it provided that whenever the navigation of any river, lake, harbor, bay, sound, or canal, or other navigable water of the United States should be obstructed or injured by any sunken vessel, boat, water craft, raft, merchantable timber, and so forth—they left out logs. Why they omitted logs and failed to provide that they should be taken out of the river and sold I do not know. The logs were omitted, while rafts were permitted to be taken out and the lumber sold after due notice. This river and harbor act of that year provided the character of notice to be given to the public, that those who were present claiming ownership of the logs were served with personal notice, and those who were absent to be visited by a notice in the newspapers.

If it is possible that the chairman and members of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors are going to antagonize this amendment, I can not account for it on any theory of justice or propriety or right from any standpoint. They claim that they only report these things which are recommended by the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors or the Chief of Engineers. This proposition has been recommended by the Chief of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, and there has been no argument or statement of facts presented which will not show that this is a just measure to be adopted by this House.

The $30,000 is to be invested in a boat, to belong to the Government. It will simply be placing that amount of money in a boat which can be used for this purpose and then for other purposes after these logs are taken out; and, then, no more logs are to be taken out than adequate to pay for the expenses of the work being done.

I will state that the Sabine River for 50 years has been a navigable stream. It is on the border line between Louisiana and Texas. It has constantly been used for navigable purposes, large steamboats plying up and down the river until the logs which broke loose from the rafts dropped into the bottom of the river and obstructed the navigation.

Mr. DIES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WATKINS. Certainly.

Mr. DIES. If I understand correctly, the favorable report from the Board of Engineers was printed too late to have this matter considered by the committee and inserted in the river and harbor bill of the House?

Mr. WATKINS. That is right.

Mr. DIES. There has been no adverse action by the House.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I will say to the gentleman that the report was before our committee.

Mr. WATKINS. As soon as we learned that there had been a report filed with the committee I went immediately to the committee. This is really the only controversy in the whole question. It is a fact that the report was filed with the committee as a private copy. As soon as I found out that the private copy had been left with the Rivers and Harbors Committee I went up for it and the chairman of the committee was kind enough to allow me the use of it. I filed a bill at once before the river and harbor bill was reported, but the Members did not have access to it in time to have a hearing before the committee. We tried to do it, made every effort, but it was too late.

To show the diligence on the part of Members interested who did not have the report, I went to the Chief of Engineers, and he did not have it, but referred me to the Government Printing Office. I made call after call day after day, as can be verified by the superintendent of the document room. I made every possible effort to get the report before the river and harbor bill was reported to the House. It was too late to have a hearing, which I would gladly have had before the committee and which I am sure they would have accorded me if I had had the opportunity to present the facts in the report.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I regret exceedingly to be obliged to oppose the amendment offered by my friend from Louisiana, as I should like much to accommodate him. It is a fact that the report was before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. It was not a final print, but a proof print, as we call it, which is frequently sent to the committee for examination. The reason we did not adopt this project and appropriate the amount recommended for a snag boat was that we were not a. all certain as to the title to these logs. If it had been certain that the Government would have had title to them and that the proceeds would then have been sufficient to pay for this snag boat and its operation, we would have adopted the report. But it came before us upon a proposition to make the logs pay for the work, and if that could not be done we inferred that the report would not have been favorable. In other words, they predicated their recommendation on the theory that the logs, when taken out, would belong to the Government.

We were not satisfied that this would be the case, and hence felt justified in rejecting the project. I want to say, so far as I am concerned, I desired to investigate the matter further and so stated to the committee at the time. This I proposed to do, and intending, if the committee should determine that the logs would belong to the Government and that there would be a sufficient number of them to pay for the improvement, to consider it when preparing the next rivers and harbors bill. At present I can not say where the ownership lies. I do not know. It might be that we would expend $30,000 for the building of a snag boat and have that snag boat on our hands with no work for it to do, as the logs may still belong to private parties. I hope the amendment will not prevail.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, how much commerce is there other than the logs on the river to justify this appropriation?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I have an idea that there will be some commerce on the river; but the matter came before us on the report of the engineers making the recommendation on the theory that the logs belonged to the Government. The inference is that if they had not thought so they would not have made a favorable recommendation.

Mr. GOULDEN. What is the length of the river proposed to be improved by this item?

Mr. WATKINS. The river has been navigated and is navigable for about 200 miles, and there is a vast amount of commerce, as shown by the hearings before the board.

Mr. GOULDEN. What towns or trading centers are there along this river?

Mr. WATKINS. The principal towns are Orange and Logansport. Those are the main towns right on the river bank, of several thousand inhabitants each, but there are several towns back from the river.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, there is no record of any commerce on the river above about mile 40, and the amount reported on the lower section is 322,102 tons, of which 182,900 tons are saw logs, the balance being crude petroleum.

I want to say before I take my seat that no blame can be attached to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WATKINS] or any member of the Louisiana delegation, because we have been requested by the gentleman and others, several times to take favorable action upon the project. In fact he presented it very urgently to the attention of the committee, and but for the nature of the report and the fear we had that the logs did not belong to the Government, we might have acted differently. Further investigation may cause favorable action.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Florida has expired.

Mr. DIES rose.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. LLOYD). Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I desire to state the facts in respect to the Sabine River and the Neches River, which latter is in the same condition as the former, but not attempted to be provided for in this amendment, and they are these: These are deep, broad rivers. In some places they are over 40 feet deep, running from 10 to 20 feet deep. At an early day they were used very extensively for logging purposes, and many of the logs that were being rafted down the river sank and they are there to-day in good condition, so far as manufacturing purposes are concerned, as they were the day they sank in the river. Private parties can not take those logs out of the river, because they do not belong to private people. One sawmill concern in my own district undertook to remove some of these logs from the river. They would be glad to take them all out, because, as I say, they are worth four or five dollars a thousand feet. They could be taken out by private persons and manufactured into lumber, and they would gladly do it, and they would gladly remove these obstructions in the river, but the moment the private concerns take these logs out of the river some man comes along and says, "That is my log and I claim it," and he files a suit under that contention and recovers for the value of the log. This is a case where the logs belong to the Government. We had this matter up before the board of review. It was not contended there that these derelict logs in a navigable stream could not be taken charge of by the Government of the United States, and the Government has a right, which individuals have not, to take these logs out of these streams and make them navigable and sell the logs. The improvement would pay for itself. That is to say, if the Government took the logs out, which it has the right to do because it is derelict property and under the absolute control of the Government, it would not cost the Treasury a cent, because the logs are worth the taking out, and amply worth it.

This amendment, if enacted into law, will not cost the Treasury a single dollar, in my judgment, because there are thousands and hundreds of thousands of feet of cypress and pine lumber lying in the beds of those rivers 10 and 20 feet deep, which could be taken out and manufactured, and no power on this earth except the Federal Government can take them out, because the Government controls the stream and no private person can take the logs out. This is certainly a meritorious amendment, and I never dreamed, until I heard the chairman of the committee say there was a question about the Government's title to these logs, that that question would be raised. Certainly the Federal Government has complete control over navigable streams, and certainly obstructions in those streams, placed there in the first instance in violation of the law and constituting an obstruction to navigation, can be taken out by the Federal Government, and there is not a doubt on the face of the earth, and the engineers so report, as I understand it, but that those logs will pay for taking them out, and it is only a question of the Government exercising its power and prerogatives to remove an obstruction in a navigable stream, which is entirely and exclusively under the Federal control. Here is a case where the amendment would not cost the Government a single dollar, and will take out obstructions in the way of valuable logs and make the stream navigable for the purposes of commerce.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, the question was asked a moment ago in reference to the commerce on this river. I wish to call the attention of the committee to the fact that on the upper river, on the Texas side, there is an inexhaustible supply of iron ore. One of the reasons for the necessity for the opening of this river is that the iron ore can be shipped down to the Gulf of Mexico and connect with the coke fields of Alabama and in that way develop a wonderful industry in this section of the country. It is only about 10 or 12 miles from this river to the most surprisingly active oil fields in the United States in De Soto Parish. The connection with iron ore, oil, and timber will develop an industry almost unlimited. With the oil development on the Louisiana side and the iron on the Texas side there is no question but what this will be one of the most important constructive pieces of legislation it is possible for that section of the country. This river, as you know, connects direct with Orange, Tex., and deep water. In that way you will have without expense to the Government developed this stream and made it navigable, and thereby developed at least three great industries in this section of the country. I sincerely hope that the amendment will pass.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, is the time all exhausted?

The CHAIRMAN. There are about three minutes remaining.

Mr. MANN. I would like to ask the question of some gentleman who knows. As I understand this amendment it is for the construction of a snag boat to take out the logs and deadheads and sell them as the property of the Government to pay the expenses.

Mr. WATKINS. If the gentleman is asking me the question, after they are condemned under notice, which is provided for in the amendment.

Mr. MANN. It is to carry out the same purpose?

Mr. WATKINS. Yes; the same.

Mr. MANN. Is there any question about the authority of the Government where the obstruction is in navigable waters and the owner was ordered to remove it by publication or otherwise, that gives the right to the Government to seize them and sell them?

Mr. WATKINS. There is, so far as wrecks and rafts are concerned, but when the logs are torn loose from the raft and become scattered——

Mr. MANN. I understand the existing law covers the others.

Mr. WATKINS. But it does not cover logs.

Mr. MANN. What I was trying to get at was quite another matter. Is there any question about the right of the Government, where the obstruction is in navigable waters and the owner of the obstruction will not remove them upon notice, for the Government to seize the obstruction and thereby become the owner of it and dispose of it as it pleases?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I should say in answer to the question I am not certain that can be done in the case of logs. Of course, as the gentleman says, there is a provision to cover boats and vessels that sink——

Mr. MANN. Why can not you do it about logs as well as about abandoned vessels?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Because there is a law justifying the one and there is no law justifying the other.

Mr. MANN. Oh, well, this makes law for the other.

Mr. SPARKMAN. No; it would not change the ownership of those logs.

Mr. MANN. This amendment does propose to change the ownership of the logs. The amendment provides, after notice is served under the section of the river and harbor act of 1899, the Government takes the logs and that the Government can sell them. That is what the amendment itself provides, if it is enacted.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I am not sure even then, Mr. Chairman, that the Government would have the ownership of those logs. I can see a difference.

Mr. MANN. The law now provides the Government does have that right about vessels. Has that point ever been decided?

Mr. WATKINS. Time and time again it has been decided as to wrecks and rafts that they had that right. There is no question about it.

Mr. MANN. That is my distinct impression.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Louisiana.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced the ayes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. SPARKMAN) there were—ayes 27, noes 30.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I call for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. Tellers are demanded. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Fifteen gentlemen have risen, not a sufficient number, and tellers are refused.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 31, between lines 17 and 18, insert the following:
"For reinforcing the Government dam across Caddo Lake, La., $50,000."

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, this is another deserving measure, and I am sure if this House could properly understand the situation there would be no trouble about its acting favorably on the amendment. The difficulty seems to be with us all that there is a disposition before we reach these measures to sustain the action of a committee of the House. After a great committee of the House has passed upon a measure, considered it in all its bearings, it is perfectly natural to believe, as a rule, that the committee is more familiar with the subject than the other Members of the House, who have not had this matter before them. So they generally stand by the committee in most instances; but in considering the amendment which has just been passed over and lost the chairman of the committee took occasion to state that in some kind of way the matter had been considered by the committee, and I believe largely on that account the members of the committee voted down that very meritorious amendment. This amendment which I now offer has never had an opportunity to come before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. It is a question which should not or would not necessarily or naturally come before the Board of Engineers or Chief of Engineers.

Now, let me hurriedly state the main outlines of the amendment, and if I can get the attention of the members of the committee I am sure that this relief which we ask will be granted. There was never a greater oversight by any committee than the oversight of three years ago, when it was provided that a navigable stream carrying thousands upon thousands of tons of freight annually should be absolutely blocked up right in the middle and navigation cut completely off. The proposition was submitted to the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors for a lock and a dam at the foot of Caddo Lake, in Caddo Parish, La. The Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors made their report, and the Committee on Rivers and Harbors took charge of that report, and when the bill was presented in the House of Representatives there was a dam, but no lock, provided for. I protested with my utmost vigor, at least to the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, at that time, but he said let it drift along and in all probability the amendment would be placed in the bill in the Senate. We expected that the amendment would be put on in the Senate, and we let it go. But when it got to the other body it met with obstructions. When that dam was placed across the stream we knew that the waters would overflow thousands of acres of our alluvial land, unless we could open it and let the water through there whenever it became an object of danger to the people in that vicinity who owned property. The Government went ahead with the construction of this dam, and in doing so it has caused disaster to the people living along the borders of Caddo Lake and at the foot of Caddo Lake to such an extent that they had to dig a canal there, which cost them a very large amount of money. Before they were allowed to finish the construction of this ditch, the engineer in charge ordered them to stop digging it because of the danger that would occur to the dam.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Louisiana has expired.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I have not had an opportunity to fairly state the case yet. I ask unanimous consent for four or five minutes more.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I fear I will have to object to that. We want to get along with this bill. We have taken up now two hours and have not read more than one page of the bill.

Mr. WATKINS. I suppose you will lose a little more time when it comes to the Mississippi River if I do not have an opportunity to state my proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WATKINS] asks unanimous consent for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WATKINS. This irrigation ditch, which is absolutely necessary to prevent the overflow of thousands of acres of alluvial land, can not now be dug because of the fact that the engineer in charge says it will cause the dam at the foot of the lake——

Mr. SPARKMAN. I will ask the gentleman if he has the report on that.

Mr. WATKINS. I have a report, not from the engineer, because he has not made a report. I have a statement of the facts here.

Mr. SPARKMAN. You have no report favoring it?

Mr. WATKINS. No; I have no engineer's report. He has stopped the work, and now they are asking, through letters and telegrams, to have an appropriation granted to prevent the destruction of that dam. What we ask, gentlemen, is that a sufficient amount of money be allowed in this bill to prop that dam to prevent the dam from falling over, so that we can make that ditch. Our navigation has been stopped, the dam has stopped the water from flowing, except over the top of the dam, and the water will overflow the alluvial lands there unless this drainage ditch can be put in, which will cost a large sum. We want to prop the dam which the Government has placed as an obstruction in our way and which will cause an overflow of those thousands of acres of the finest alluvial lands known. And the project is one taken charge of by this Rivers and Harbors Committee.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to state that I am not an obstructionist. I am not raising a howl or making a kick, as it is commonly called, against the report of this committee at this time, but it is a fact that there are navigable streams right in that immediate section of the country which have not been alluded to at all in this bill which have carried appropriations for the last 50 years. Every appropriation bill for the last 50 years has carried in it measures for the protection of streams in the fourth congressional district of Louisiana, which I have the honor to represent, except this present appropriation bill; but I am not intending at this time to offer an amendment. We will pass that part of it which refers to Louisiana, and for the present I will not say anything in regard to that, if we can get protection for these people who are in great danger there on account of the order which the engineer in charge has issued not to proceed with the construction of the ditch. The engineer requires that the protection of this dam should be provided for before they can proceed with the digging of the ditch, which is necessary to drain and prevent the overflow and destruction of their land.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, there being no favorable recommendation for this improvement I am constrained to object to it, and I hope the amendment will not prevail.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WATKINS].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Galveston Channel, Tex.: Continuing improvement by construction of sea-wall extension in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 1390, Sixty-second Congress, third session, $1,185,000: Provided, That no part of the amount herein appropriated shall be expended, and no contract shall be entered into under this appropriation until the county or city of Galveston and other local interests shall have donated the necessary lands to the United States, and shall have quieted all claims to the present San Jacinto Reservation, nor until the said county or city of Galveston shall have obtained a right of way and made provision in a manner satisfactory to the Secretary of War for paying the cost of constructing at least 3,300 feet of sea-wall extension in addition to that herein appropriated for: Provided further, That the entire work of construction shall be done under the direction of the Secretary of War, and the funds appropriated by Congress and those furnished by the county or city of Galveston shall be expended by him: And provided also, That the pavement of the roadway over the new sea wall shall conform in width to that heretofore constructed by the city of Galveston.

Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURGESS] offers a committee amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 32, line 12, after the word "also," by striking out all after the word "also" down to the word "Galveston," in line 14, and inserting in lieu thereof the following:
"That the structure shall in all respects conform to that heretofore constructed by the county of Galveston."

Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Chairman, the only effect of that amendment is to strike out "the city of Galveston" and simplify the language. The previous construction was done by the county of Galveston and not by the city of Galveston.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I was going to ask the chairman of the committee a question, but I yield the floor to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to suggest——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman offer an amendment?

Mr. BURGESS. No, sir. I want to speak to this item as amended.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can move to strike out the last word.

Mr. BURGESS. Then I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURGESS] is recognized.

Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Chairman, this appropriation calls to mind the great storm at Galveston. I was then a candidate for Congress for the first time, and was down at Galveston at the time the storm occurred—the worst calamity that ever occurred in the history of this country. Ten thousand lives went out with the tide. Millions of dollars' worth of property was destroyed. The whole city was dazed with the calamity that had befallen it.

But one ray of light gleamed over that scene of despair. The jetties were uninjured, and the harbor was still secure. The people rallied about that one ray of light, and they have made the most magnificent struggle against adversity that has ever been witnessed on this continent. They have taxed themselves to build a sea wall somewhat over 4 miles in length, 17 feet high, 16 feet wide at the base, concaving toward the Gulf, and in addition to that they have raised the grade of the land up to the height of the sea wall, and in all they themselves have expended over $5,000,000.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURGESS. Certainly.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. This paragraph states that the appropriation is made in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 1390, Sixty-second Congress, third session. That report recommends that this appropriation should be made only upon three conditions. Two of those conditions are embodied in the paragraph. One of the conditions, and one of the most important, is not embodied in the paragraph. Can the gentleman tell me why?

Mr. BURGESS. I think the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I am not mistaken.

Mr. BURGESS. We will read and see. What condition does the gentleman allude to?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The first condition that was made in that report is that—

> In addition to any appropriation that the Government might make toward this extension of the sea wall should be contingent on a satisfactory cession to the United States, free of cost, of all land east and north of a line originating at the intersection of the center line of the south jetty with the present boundary of the Fort Jacinto Reservation and extending thence approximately south 16 degrees to the Gulf of Mexico (this line being made parallel to the numbered streets of the city of Galveston). It is estimated that the triangular area thus donated to the Government between this line and the extended sea wall and the present southern boundary of Fort San Jacinto will contain 600 acres.

Now, this paragraph does not contain any such provision.

Mr. BURGESS. Excuse me; the gentleman is mistaken. Let me read it.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. BURGESS. I read:

> Continuing improvement by construction of sea-wall extension in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 1390, Sixty-second Congress, third session, $1,185,000.

Now, if it stopped there, that would be sufficient. It refers to the report. But it continues:

> Provided, That no part of the amount herein appropriated shall be expended, and no contract shall be entered into under this appropriation until the county or city of Galveston and other local interests shall have donated the necessary lands to the United States, and shall have quieted all claims to the present San Jacinto Reservation, nor until the said county or city of Galveston shall have obtained a right of way and made provision in a manner satisfactory to the Secretary of War for paying the cost of constructing at least 3,300 feet of sea-wall extension in addition to that herein appropriated for.

That is what the gentleman refers to?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. That does not include the 600 acres. This simply includes the land for building the sea wall.

Mr. BURGESS. Oh, I beg the gentleman's pardon. That refers to the same thing that the gentleman refers to. There can be no question about that.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. There can not be any question otherwise. The idea that when it says land for the sea wall it means 600 acres of land in a triangular area is erroneous.

Mr. BURGESS. There can not be any question about that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Chairman, I would like five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURGESS] asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Chairman, when I was interrupted by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] I had said that the people of Galveston in the work of rehabilitation of that city had done the most remarkable work ever done by anybody on this continent. Galveston was a comparatively small city. There were less than 50,000 people under the census there. Ten thousand of them lost their lives. This awful storm came. A great many left. The remainder set to work to rehabilitate their city. They have expended over $5,000,000. They have not asked a dollar at the hands of the National Government. They have asked no appropriation from this Congress. They have done this, and they are entitled to all respect and all admiration of the people of this country.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for just a moment?

Mr. BURGESS. Yes.

Mr. BRYAN. It is worthy of comment that they established a method of efficiency, a precedent of efficiency in municipal government that formed practically a revolution in municipal government all over the country.

Mr. BURGESS. I was just going to allude to that. As soon as the storm was over they set to work, and first they elected me to Congress. That was the smallest thing they did. [Laughter.] Then they adopted a commission form of government that has become an example for the whole country, and they did all this other work.

And this is the final keystone that connects the sea wall with the south jetty and makes a jetty construction of over 5 miles in length along the Gulf and protects the city and the harbor for all time against another recurring storm following that one, the like of which no man ever heard, that swept the city on September 8, 1900. I was there. Pen can not paint nor tongue tell the awful situation. Many tried it. You may remember reading accounts that were printed in the newspapers all over the country. But I tell you 10,000 lives were lost. An awful daze seemed to be on everybody's mind. Nobody seemed able to cope with the situation. It was as if the hand of God had fallen upon them in awful devastation. But the harbor still stood; the jetties still stood—the harbor and the jetties that had made the city originally, and they have made it now, with the efforts of those gallant people.

I represented the district only two years, and then I was placed in another district that had been carved out; but I have been the friend of Galveston, and will be as long as I am in Congress and as long as I live. The people of Galveston challenge the admiration, the affection, the confidence of every people everywhere on earth who know what they have done and what they have gone through. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I will ask permission to print a letter from the chairman of the deep water committee of the city of Galveston in connection with my remarks, and I ask also the privilege of revising and extending my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the letter referred to:

GALVESTON DEEP WATER COMMITTEE,
Galveston, Tex., February 27, 1914.

Hon. GEORGE F. BURGESS, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. BURGESS: I beg to submit the following:

After the storm of September 8, 1900, the city of Galveston appointed a board of engineers, consisting of Gen. H. M. Roberts, Alfred Noble, and H. C. Ripley, to devise plans for the protection of the city "against the force of the waves and currents in the severest storms known to occur in the Gulf of Mexico." This board in their report recommended the construction of a reinforced concrete sea wall along the Gulf front of the city and the raising of the grade of the city; the sea wall to be constructed upon piling driven to a depth sufficient to have from 10 to 15 feet penetration in clay, and to be 16 feet wide at the base, concave toward the Gulf, 5 feet wide at the top and 17 feet high, protected from undermining by sheet piling and riprap, and the entire area of the city back of the sea wall to be filled to a height next to the sea wall of 19 feet above mean low tide, with a slope of 1 foot in 50 across the city toward the bay.

After this report had been made to the city Congress, in the rivers and harbors act of January 13, 1902, authorized the appointment of a board of engineers to examine and report plans for protecting the port and the Government's property here. A board of which Col. Adams was the head was appointed. This board came to Galveston, examined the conditions, and reported that the proposed protective works recommended by the Roberts board were ample in every respect for the protection of the Government's property, the port, and aids to commerce.

After these reports had been made, the city being unable to finance the entire work, the county of Galveston constructed the sea wall, at an approximate cost of one and a half million dollars, and the United States Government extended the sea wall in front of the Fort Crockett Reservation and raised the grade of the reservation to conform with that established by the Roberts board, at a cost of $750,000.

Along and back of this sea wall, and as a part of the protective works, is a boulevard consisting of a concrete sidewalk 16 feet wide next to the wall, a brick-paved roadway 54 feet in width, and then a grass plot 30 feet in width extends the whole length of the sea wall more than 4½ miles in length.

After the sea wall was completed the city of Galveston raised its grade, which was then on a level with the base of the sea wall, to the level of the top of the wall plus an additional 2 feet. This grade slopes to the north as far as Broadway, which is about the center of the city. The filling required the deposit of something over 20,000,000 yards of sand at a cost to the city of approximately $2,250,000. In the area which was filled by the city every house, fence, street car track, railroad track, in fact every structure of any kind had to be raised to the new level and every sidewalk, sewer, and water main rebuilt and streets repaved, the cost of which to the private citizens was twice as much as the expenditures made by the county and city in these protective works. What seemed immediately after the storm of September 8, 1900, impossible to accomplish has now been achieved and stands as a monument to the energy, pluck, and determination of an American city whose foreign commerce is to-day next to that of New York.

The value of the export commerce of Galveston for the year 1900 was $92,515,549, while for the year 1913 it amounted to $254,877,912. The value of imports for the year 1900 is not available, but that for the year 1903 amounted to $1,511,334. For the year 1913 it amounted to $7,820,630.

There are now millions of bushels of corn being imported through this port from Argentina, and thousands of cattle from the Republics of Mexico and Central America.

The terminal facilities for handling the commerce which now passes over the wharves of this port equal those of any port in the world and are being extended as rapidly as the needs of commerce require. These terminal facilities have a value of more than $15,000,000.

R. WAVERLY SMITH,
Chairman Galveston Deep-Water Committee.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 32, line 8, after the words "appropriated for," insert "nor until there shall be ceded to the United States, free of charge or costs, all land east and north of a line originating at the intersection of the center line of the south jetty with the present boundary of the Fort Jacinto Reservation, and thence approximately south 16 degrees east to the Gulf of Mexico."

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, as I said before, this paragraph provides that this appropriation, which is quite a large one—over a million dollars—is made in accordance with a certain report.

This report, after recommending the appropriation, recommends it only upon three particular conditions. The first condition named in the report is the one which is found in the amendment I have introduced. It provides for the cession of about 600 acres. The language in the bill, which has been referred to by the gentleman from Texas as covering this 600 acres, is found at the top of page 32, and says:

Shall have donated the necessary lands to the United States.

Now, that can not refer to this 600 acres, which is a triangular piece of land located entirely off and away from this sea wall itself, as is shown by the map attached to the report.

With all deference to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURGESS], it is simply absurd to say that that language at the top of page 32 includes this 600 acres. For some reason, which the committee so far have declined to give, they have omitted one of the conditions, and the most important condition, upon which this appropriation was recommended to be made. I should like to have some member of the committee state why this is done. This land ought to be given to the United States. The building of this sea wall is a great deal more for the benefit of the city of Galveston than it is for the benefit of the United States. It is true it affords some protection to the Government reservation at Fort Jacinto there, but the Government is building twice as much of this sea wall as the city of Galveston is building, and, as I have said, the sea wall is more for the benefit of the city of Galveston than it is for the benefit of the Government. The city of Galveston is to build 3,300 feet of the sea wall and the Government is to build 7,000 feet.

This is simply an attempt to get away from the recommendations of the report that was made after careful examination and upon which we are supposed to act.

Mr. BURGESS. When the gentleman says that, he is unkind. There is no disposition on the part of anybody to get away from anything. What makes the gentleman say that?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I say it simply because it is the fact.

Mr. BURGESS. The gentleman says it because it conforms to the spirit of the times to say anything that will reflect on the committee. Now, what evidence has the gentleman that we wanted to get away from anything?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I have the evidence of this report and the plat attached to it. I say that the committee are not treating me nor the other Members of the House fairly when they say I am attacking the committee because they have not complied with the conditions of the report which they set out, and say they are complying with it when they are not.

Mr. BURGESS. We intended to comply with it. There has never been any question about the cession by the county of Galveston of the land specified in the report.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Then what is the objection to the amendment?

Mr. BURGESS. I have no objection, none in the world, to putting in that language, but I think it is already covered.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I have simply quoted it word for word from the report.

Mr. BURGESS. I understand; but what is the use?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Simply because you have left out that part of it.

Mr. BURGESS. That has not been left out. What did we mean by saying:

Until the county or city of Galveston and other local interests shall have donated the necessary lands to the United States.

That is what they are called in the report.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Necessary for what?

Mr. BURGESS. Necessary lands that they have promised to donate.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Necessary for what?

Mr. BURGESS. I will read from the report.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The land necessary for this sea wall is only a few hundred feet wide. It does not include this 600 acres at all.

Mr. BURGESS. Let me read from the report. If the gentleman wants to hear, he will please listen.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I have the report in my hand.

Mr. BURGESS. The recommendation of Gen. Bixby concerning the sea wall is contained in this language:

That the sea wall be extended for the protection of the harbor from blockade by storms and to permit an extension eastward of the wharf facilities, said work, however, not to be undertaken until the city of Galveston and other local interests first donate certain lands to the Government, quiet all claims to the present San Jacinto Reservation, and provide for the construction of 3,300 feet of similar sea-wall extension.

Now, this bill follows Gen. Bixby's language which was referred to, and the gentleman reads from the report, which is at greater length. That is all there is to it. There is no effort to get away from anything. The gentleman is making a technical objection. He can amend this if he wants to. I have no objection.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The amendment is before the House.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. LLOYD). The question is on the amendment.

Mr. GREGG. I should like to have the amendment reported again.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will, if there be no objection, report the amendment again.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 32, line 8, after the words "appropriated for" insert "Nor until there shall be ceded to the United States free of charge or costs all land east and north of a line originating at the intersection of the center line of the south jetty with the present boundary of the Fort Jacinto Reservation, and thence approximately south 16° east to the Gulf of Mexico."

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. There is one word left out there. It should be "southern boundary." I ask unanimous consent that the word "southern" be inserted.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to insert the word "southern."

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. So that it will read:

The present southern boundary of the Fort Jacinto Reservation.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, the very fact that the gentleman now suggests a change in the description shows that we ought not to adopt an amendment changing the description of this property in this way. The bill provides that this money shall not be available until the city of Galveston and other localities shall have donated the necessary lands to the United States.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Necessary for what?

Mr. BRYAN. The land necessary for this improvement. It can not be interpreted in any other way.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Certainly; and all that is necessary for the improvement is enough land for the sea wall.

Mr. BRYAN. If they get all the land that is necessary, and no land that is necessary is left out, and if everybody is satisfied, and the sea wall is built, and the Government owns the title to all the land that is necessary and in accordance with the report you refer to, what more does my friend want? I do not think it is advisable to amend this section in this way.

I think the committee must have considered the matter carefully, and if we try to put in a definite description, we ought to be sure it is right.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I quoted the description from the report, and there is simply a word left out.

Mr. BRYAN. It not only provides for the cession of the necessary land, but the bill says:

Provided, That no part of the amount herein appropriated shall be expended, and no contract shall be entered into under this appropriation until the county or city of Galveston and other local interests shall have donated the necessary lands to the United States, and shall have quieted all claims to the present San Jacinto Reservation, nor until the said county or city of Galveston shall have obtained a right of way and made provision in a manner satisfactory to the Secretary of War for paying the cost of constructing at least 3,300 feet of seawall extension in addition to that herein appropriated for.

Mr. CARTER. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the beginning of the item says:

Improving Galveston Channel, Tex.: Continuing improvement by construction of sea-wall extension in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 1390, Sixty-second Congress, third session.

That seems to be perfectly clear.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes; and it adds two provisos to it; but the third one recommended in the report is omitted. It would not be necessary to put in two provisos if the construction of the gentleman from Oklahoma is correct.

Mr. CARTER. I do not think it would be necessary, because it says, as plain as can be, that it shall be constructed in accordance with the report—the very report the gentleman speaks of.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman, as a lawyer, would not make any such statement as that.

Mr. CARTER. I am not much of a lawyer; but I can understand the English language like this.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman will find that it will take a lawyer to get title to this land if it is not put in by this amendment.

Mr. BRYAN. We do not want title to the land; we are attempting to get a sea wall, and if we get sufficient land for that purpose, that is enough.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. HARDWICK having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 9671. An act to appropriate $5,000 to erect a suitable monument on the battle grounds at the Horseshoe, on the Tallapoosa River, in the State of Alabama; and

H. R. 9897. An act to amend section 12 of the act entitled "An act to amend and consolidate the acts respecting copyright," approved March 4, 1909.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving inland waterway on coast of Texas: For maintenance of that section of the waterway between West Galveston Bay and Brazos River Canal, $15,000; for maintenance of channel between Brazos River and Matagorda Bay, $25,000; for maintenance of channel from Aransas Pass to Pass Cavallo, $20,000; for completing improvement and for maintenance of Guadalupe River up to Victoria, $15,000; for improvement of that section between Galveston and the Sabine River in accordance with the report printed in Rivers and Harbors Committee Document No. 7, Sixty-third Congress, first session, and subject to the conditions set forth in said document, $150,000; for improvement of that section between Brazos Santiago and the Rio Grande in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 610, Sixty-third Congress, second session, $80,000; in all, $315,000: Provided, That no expense shall be incurred by the United States for acquiring any lands required for the purpose of this improvement.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the words "Brazos Santiago and the Rio Grande," line 18, page 34, and insert in lieu thereof the words: "Corpus Christi Bay and Baffins Bay."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I understood from what occurred last evening that this paragraph concerning the intercoastal way is subject to a point of order. I do not know whether it is true or not. I do not intend to raise the point of order. I believe Texas is clearly entitled to this appropriation if the other portions of the intercoastal canal are to have theirs. I am personally opposed to the entire proposition, because I believe it unconsidered and largely an engineers' project. Beyond that, I have two or three reasons for refusing to single out Texas after other localities have been favored. I have great admiration for Texas. It is the one State that furnished us the Angora goat which marched through this House without difficulty, marched through the Senate at the head of the tariff bill, and from thence up the Avenue to the White House, where it took the skin off all the sheep of the North and of the West, and then was able, without having ever been sidetracked in any particular, to remain in the bill. [Laughter.]

Then there is a second reason why I admire Texas. It has a governor who declares he is going to protect the people of his State, no matter what is done by the administration at Washington; he does not wait for its aid or assurances.

Again, I have great admiration for the State because there is a gentleman in the delegation [Mr. CALLAWAY] who has arisen to his feet day after day, an able Member from that State who has fought this bill because of its iniquities. He has pointed out inaccuracies and appropriations that ought not to be allowed. He has been subjected to ridicule and scoffing and to abuse on that side of the aisle. Some things have been said which are unfair and unfortunate, not coming from the committee. During all his talk he has rendered a great service to his constituents, in my humble judgment, and a greater service to the people of the country, in pointing out these defects than has the distinguished gentleman who, by his presence on the committee, has been able to secure 25 different appropriations for small creeks emptying into the Albemarle Sound, appropriations large enough to satisfy his constituents but small enough to squeeze through the committee. They had the merit of being small.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. I will.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I have not been present all the time. I want to ask if the gentleman from Texas has been heard since we reached the Texas items?

Mr. FREAR. Not at all; there has been no filibuster by either of us, but he is amply qualified to take care of himself. [Laughter.]

Mr. CALLAWAY. If the gentleman will possess his soul in patience he will hear from me.

Mr. FREAR. I am sure the gentleman is sincere and doing a great service in his criticisms against this painful canal proposition. I want to tell a story to illustrate this. I was talking with an old gentleman last Sunday and he said to me, "I have been having a very severe pain." I asked, "What is the trouble?" "Why, I have intercostal rheumatism; it is an awful pain between the ribs," he replied. I realized at once that this canal was traveling under a misnomer, it is an "intercostal canal," and Uncle Sam when he shoulders this tremendous appropriation which will eventually require over $200,000,000 to complete the project, he is going to have an awful pain between the ribs. [Laughter.]

A MEMBER. A pain in the alimentary canal.

Mr. FREAR. It might be in the alimentary canal, also, but I assert that he would not want to build an intercoastal canal if the people correctly understand what is intended here. It is disclosed by this bill that the committee itself is almost helpless. The committee's hands are tied and the House supports the committee. Why? Because it must follow the report of the engineer in every case unless it refuses the project and the engineer is supreme. What influence is brought to bear upon him? What influence is at work when he overturns the report of the division engineer so frequently?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. FREAR. I will not ask for further time, Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Brazos River, Tex.: Continuing improvement from Old Washington to Waco by the construction of locks and dams heretofore authorized, $200,000; continuing improvement and for maintenance by open-channel work from Velasco to Old Washington, $25,000; in all, $225,000.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I am going to discuss only one of these propositions. I am acquainted with the Brazos River; I am acquainted with the Trinity River. My grandfather went to Texas in 1836. My father was born in Texas in 1839. I was born there, and I know the State of Texas. There was no man ever born that loves his State more than I love mine. No man ever was born that would go further to do what he could for the promotion of the interests of his State than would I. But, Mr. Chairman, when I come into this House and see men bring in a proposition to navigate the Brazos and Trinity Rivers, I am surprised, for going back and forth over the State, on horseback and in wagon, I ford these rivers, and time and again I have seen them standing in holes below the points called the head of navigation. In Dallas for months they could not get enough water to supply the actual necessities of the city, and they hauled water there by rail.

Mr. FREAR. Is not that a case like the Kissimmee River in Florida, where it ought to be insured against fire?

Mr. CALLAWAY. Yes; and if this were the only proposition, it would not be so bad.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALLAWAY. No; I have not the time. If this were the only such project, I could not support an appropriation for it, because I think we ought to be earnest and sincere about these things. I believe that I can show you by the actual wording of the engineer's report that there is no serious intention of ever navigating the Trinity River.

Mr. GARNER. The Brazos.

Mr. CALLAWAY. No; the Trinity. I have not looked at the Brazos in the same way, because time is so limited. In 1902 they started on the present Trinity River project. It must be a great deal better project than the Peedee and Lumber Rivers, for they have just started on the Peedee and the Lumber Rivers; and it must be better than Matawan Creek, in New Jersey, on which they appropriate $137,000 for the purpose of deepening a canal for 2 miles, because they have just started on Matawan Creek; and it must be away yonder better than the Kissimmee Creek, in Florida. I take it that the Trinity River is a very good proposition, looked at from the standpoint of the engineers. They started on this project in 1902. They estimated that the entire project would cost $4,000,000, and up to this time they have expended $2,229,142.93. The original estimate by these scientific engineers, who are supposed to make no mistakes, was that it would cost $4,000,000 to complete the project. They have worked on it since 1902—12 years—and now they say it will take 100 to 130 per cent more than that, or practically $10,000,000, to complete the project; and these scientific men say that the appropriations which have been made so far by Congress for the Trinity River "seem to indicate an intention to provide locks and dams." [Laughter.] They have expended $2,000,000 so far. This year we have $205,000 in the bill to continue that work which is going to take $8,000,000 to complete—$200,000 a year. How long will it take to complete that project? Why, it will take 41 years longer, according to the way this committee is proceeding, according to the way these engineers are proceeding; and they have already been working on it for 12 years. That makes 53 years from the time they started; and they are going to expend two and a half times as much as the original estimate. My friend from Dallas does not certainly expect to navigate the Trinity River. He may have some children who will navigate it, but, according to the showing made by these engineers, at the present rate of progress this gentleman who is now in Congress getting these appropriations, and every other Member of Congress interested in the Trinity River, will be gathered to his fathers before the first boat goes up the river. They say "no commerce can go on it until it is completely canalized."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, if I may be granted five minutes more, I think I will be able to complete what I have to say.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes more and that I have 10 minutes in which to reply.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, the Brazos River is not as good a river as the Trinity. It has a broader bottom and carries a great deal more coarse sand, and shifts on the bottom from one side to the other. It is swifter than the Trinity, though it does not run much more water.

Mr. MADDEN. Did the gentleman say that there was a doubt in the minds of the engineers whether it was the intention of Congress to build locks and dams?

Mr. CALLAWAY. That is what I read. Those are not the only projects. I refer to them simply because I know something about them, and because the engineer's report is so clear on the Trinity and because they have been working on the project for 12 years. I think I have conclusively shown to any reasoning mind that they never intend to navigate the Trinity River. It is simply a question of spending money, because who in this country wants to start a project which, according to the present appropriations and estimates of the engineers and what they are doing, can not be completed in less than 41 years? Who in this House knows what kind of transportation facilities we will by that time have developed? You can not tell anything about it. We may be traveling in airships by that time, carrying our freight in an altogether different way from what we do now.

If they were making a real effort to establish navigation, they would complete some project, and then get the boats from this commission that we sent out here three years ago with half a million dollars to try and devise some kind of craft to go on shallow water. You know that we provided for a commission with half a million dollars to determine that, and they have been at work for four years, and that commission reports now that they are about to go to work. All this expenditure carried on by the Republican Party did not seem unnatural, but look at what our platform says. In 1904 we said:

> Large reductions can easily be made in the annual expenditures of the Government without impairing the efficiency of any branch of the public service, and we shall insist upon the strictest economy and frugality.

In 1908 we said:

> The Republican Congress in the sesssion just ended made appropriations amounting to $1,800,000,000, exceeding the total expenditures of the past fiscal year by $90,000,000, leaving a deficit of more than $60,000,000 for the fiscal year just ended. We denounce the needless waste of the peoples money which has resulted in the appalling increase.

In 1912 we said:

> We denounce the profligate waste of the money wrung from the people by oppressive taxation through the lavish appropriations of the recent Republican Congresses, which have kept taxes high and reduced the purchasing power of the people.

And yet the last Congress appropriated $2,054,584,510. How does that compare with the Republican expenditure, when we are complaining of their extravagance? In 1904 the Republicans expended $736,578,402.76. In 1908 they expended $918,362,329.07.

Mr. FREAR. And there are other items in the sundry civil bill.

Mr. CALLAWAY. The Republicans in the Fifty-seventh Congress spent on rivers and harbors $52,783,349; in the Fifty-ninth Congress they spent on rivers and harbors $60,754,863. We Democrats spent on rivers and harbors in the Sixty-first Congress $80,263,960.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HENRY. How much more time does the gentleman want?

Mr. CALLAWAY. I think five minutes.

Mr. HENRY. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that his colleague may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CALLAWAY. This bill carries $43,000,000. If we improve as much next year over this year's expenditure as we did last year over the first year of the Sixty-first Congress, we will reach the princely sum of $67,000,000, or $111,000,000 during this Congress. And for what? To really improve commerce? No; it is a mere outlay of money on the Trinity and the Brazos Rivers and this intercoastal canal that will carry no freight.

Mr. MADDEN. To carry on the waves.

Mr. BRYAN. How about settling the dust of southwest Texas?

Mr. CALLAWAY. We have not got much dust along the coast. I yield back whatever time I may not have consumed.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Chairman, I am devoted to my colleague, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY], and dislike very much to hear him discuss a subject about which he seems to know absolutely nothing. [Laughter.] I have a great regard for his courage and his patriotism, but am not willing for his remarks touching these Texas projects to go in the RECORD unchallenged. Mr. Chairman, let me tell the gentleman a few things about some of the Texas projects and say to him that he will live to see the day when he will be ashamed that he has made this speech to-day.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HENRY. I will yield for a question.

Mr. CALLAWAY. The engineers who have made this report say it will take 41 years. That is a long time for a man to live, and at that rate I will be 82 years old.

Mr. HENRY. Oh, the gentleman seems not to have read the engineers' report, and that is what I am deploring. Mr. Chairman, I rise here to-day not only for the purpose of indorsing the Brazos River project but the Trinity River as well, and the intercoastal canal and every Texas project in this bill. I undertake to say that not a single one of them is unworthy. Gentlemen like my friend [Mr. CALLAWAY] may prate about the rivers and harbors bill and pork barrels as much as they please, but the American people intend to improve every worthy river and harbor in this Republic and appropriate the millions of dollars necessary to relieve the people from the burdens of exorbitant railroad freight rates. [Applause.]

This gentleman knows naught of what he speaks here to-day. He is poorly informed, and I regret that he has made this speech. Let me tell him something about the Brazos River that he seems never to have learned either from tradition or history. He says it is a more indifferent proposition than the Trinity River. What is this Brazos River project the gentleman assails as being in this bill? The Brazos River rises in the lower part of New Mexico and flows 900 miles across the great State of Texas into the Gulf of Mexico. It is the largest river west of the Mississippi flowing into the Gulf of Mexico. For a distance of nearly 100 miles from its mouth up to Richmond it has been navigated for more than 70 years.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HENRY. I would rather not be disturbed until I get through.

Mr. CALLAWAY. I would like to ask one question.

Mr. HENRY. All right.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Is not that the Brazos River that runs by Lubbock?

Mr. HENRY. Oh, yes. Lubbock is nearly 1,000 miles from its mouth.

Mr. CALLAWAY. You state that it rises in New Mexico?

Mr. HENRY. I know more of this than you do. You do not know anything about the lower reaches of the Brazos River. The gentleman is not willing to learn. I think a great deal of my colleague and therefore want to instruct him to-day.

This river previous to the war between the States was navigated from Waco, where I reside, a distance of 429 miles from its mouth, and men are living there to-day who have seen boats loaded with 1,000 bales of cotton and shipped down the river to the high seas. It was navigated before the war. The Legislature of the State of Texas appropriated money prior to the breaking out of the Civil War to open this great artery of commerce for navigable purposes, and it was navigated for a number of years up to old Fort Sullivan, in Milam County, a distance of over 300 miles. Regular lines of boats ran on the stream. And when the gentleman talks about its being a dry stream, he is mistaken.

The engineer, Col. Jadwin, one of the distinguished men who helped to build the Gatun Lock on the Panama Canal, over next to the Atlantic Ocean, several years ago made a survey of the Brazos River, and in a special report said there was no worthier river in all the confines of Texas or the South for improving, and that it ought to be improved. In his special report he said that by the construction of eight locks and dams there would be navigation for six months in the year, with a depth of 6 to 8 feet feet of water, and that barges could be floated carrying 2,000 bales of cotton at rates competing with and reducing the railroad rates of the country. And in pursuance of his report, made a few years ago, we have commenced the construction of locks and dams.

The first one has been completed, 170 miles from the mouth of the river; the second one, just below Waco, is almost completed; and two others have been provided for. From first to last Congress has appropriated more than $1,000,000 to improve this stream, and in a short while we will have constructed the eight locks and dams on the Brazos River; in less than five years, if Congress does its duty, we will have a navigable stream a distance of 429 miles, and my colleague [Mr. CALLAWAY] will not have to wait much longer.

Let me tell him another thing, too. This Brazos River runs through his district, and before he is an old man we will have locks and dams in his territory up to Granbury, in Hood County.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Will the gentleman yield just for a minute?

Mr. HENRY. I will yield this time.

Mr. CALLAWAY. I wish to say that one of the most humorous political conventions that I ever attended was a political convention at Granbury, when they proposed to introduce a resolution to improve the Brazos River.

Mr. HENRY. If the gentleman is not careful and they read his remarks, they will have another humorous convention in that district, but it will not be humorous to him. [Laughter.]

Now, what is the stream of which I speak? It is one of the great rivers of the South. It is worthy to be improved, and if it cost $4,000,000, aye, $10,000,000, to improve this system of locks and dams, it ought and will be done.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY. I will yield to my colleague.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. I will ask my colleague that if one of the greatest benefits that can accrue to the cotton growers of Texas—around Waco, Dallas, and Fort Worth—is that when we get up to those cities we will reduce the freight rates down to the water rates?

Mr. HENRY. I thank the gentleman for his suggestion, and want to say this in reply, and was about coming to it: The gentleman here, my colleague [Mr. CALLAWAY], does not realize that he is harming himself and hurting his people. He is damaging the great State of Texas. He ought to remember that along the Brazos River is produced one-third of the cotton crop of the State of Texas. In a little over 30 counties is produced a little more than 1,000,000 bales of cotton every year. And Col. Jadwin in this report concludes that when these eight locks and dams are completed and snags are taken out of the lower portion of the river and it is open for navigation, on cotton alone the people in that section of the State will be saved $3,000,000 every year in freight rates. [Applause.] Think of the saving in outgoing and incoming railroad freight rates on other commerce.

The gentleman does not clearly understand the subject. Let me tell him something for the benefit of his people. Take the Mississippi River. You can ship a bale of cotton from Memphis to New Orleans, a distance of 600 miles, on the Mississippi River, for 60 cents. The railroads parallel that great artery of commerce, and they have been forced down in their freight rates until they carry the cotton now, and nearly 96 per cent of the freight is carried on the railroads instead of the bosom of the Mississippi River. The railroads paralleling the Mississippi River are very prosperous and the people are relieved of their burdens.

What is the gentleman's situation? What is it in the towns of the gentleman's district? In Waco, my district, and Fort Worth and other towns in the gentleman's district, when the farmers ship a bale of cotton from anywhere in that region to the Gulf they must pay the exorbitant rate of $3.50 or $3.75 per bale. Col. Jadwin says in his report that when these eight locks and dams are completed—and four of them will soon be completed—the freight rates will be reduced, and the farmers of the gentleman's district can ship their cotton from that section of Texas to the deep-water ports on the Gulf of Mexico for 50 or 75 cents per bale. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HENRY. What does it imply? Simply this, that when this system of locks and dams is finished on the Brazos River that the gentleman is assailing to-day, the farmers for 40 miles on each side of that great river, where the cotton crop is produced, can load their cotton on their wagons and drive their teams to the wharves on the river and ship it out to the high seas for 75 cents a bale, whereas now it costs them $3.50 per bale. [Applause.]

Yes; I am for improving the Brazos River. I am for improving the Trinity River, and am for improving every river by appropriating millions of dollars out of the Treasury of the United States to relieve the people and the producers from the burdens of exorbitant freight rates throughout the country. [Applause.] It is money well spent and will come back to them fourfold.

Ah, the gentleman has not studied the subject. He does not seem to know it. So far as the Brazos River project is concerned, it is safe. We are building those locks and dams now, and the gentleman can not hurt them. He harms only himself and his State in making these attacks. The Trinity River is a perfectly feasible enterprise, and no engineer yet sent out by the Government has ever said that there was the slightest obstacle to the improvement of either one of those rivers. They both ought to be improved. Why? Here is a great State of about 266,000 square miles in area, a State larger than the thirteen original States of this Union, larger than all of New England, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Indiana, and Ohio combined. We are entitled to have our rivers opened for navigation, as you have opened yours in the North and Middle West. [Applause.] Texas, a vast empire, with all of her fertile land, oppressed by extortionate freight rates, has placed her cause before the Engineering Department and before Congress. They are now secure, notwithstanding such attacks as these, even though they come from my good friend, a Representative from the State of Texas, whose voice ought to be heard in favor of these things instead of trying to hold them up to the ridicule and the scorn of the world. He should not do it. [Applause.]

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will my colleague yield to me a moment?

Mr. HENRY. With pleasure.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is it not a fact that the early legislatures of the State of Texas made immense land grants for the purpose of improving these very rivers that we are providing for to-day?

Mr. HENRY. We did; and not only did we make enormous land grants, but the State of Texas donated 35,000 acres to the railroads in order to develop that country. And we intend to develop the rivers, harbors, and waterways to supplement that earlier development.

Mr. CALLAWAY. The gentleman says they made immense land grants for the improvement of these rivers. If it was for the purpose of navigation, it failed of its object. We are still making grants, but have no navigation on these rivers yet.

Mr. HENRY. The gentleman is a very young man yet, according to his own admission. [Laughter.] But there has been navigation.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. If my colleague will permit, I will state to the gentleman that my mother's brother, before the Civil War, built the first steamboat that was built and run on the Trinity River. That was before I was born.

Mr. HENRY. I do not doubt that at all. If my colleague [Mr. CALLAWAY] will listen to me and linger with me awhile, he will learn something about the Trinity and Brazos Rivers. [Laughter.] He has made a mistake to-day, but I am his friend still. I am loyally devoted to him. The gentleman says there is no commerce on those rivers.

Mr. CALLAWAY. No; I did not state that.

Mr. HENRY. Well, the gentleman said there is not much commerce.

Mr. CALLAWAY. No. I said those rivers run through the heart of the most prosperous sections of the State. I said there was not any commerce on the southern part of the coast.

Mr. HENRY. There is no commerce on the Panama Canal yet, and still we have paid out nearly $400,000,000 to build that great isthmian waterway. But there will be commerce on it when it is finished and opened to the ships of the world. There will be commerce on those rivers in Texas when the work of improvement is completed and they are opened to boats that will naturally go there in five years. If the gentleman will come down to Waco—and I want him to come down and be my guest—I will put him on a boat there, loaded with 2,000 bales of cotton, and will take him 430 miles from Waco to the Gulf on one of the greatest rivers of the Southland.

A MEMBER. Are you going to dump him in the Gulf? [Laughter.]

Mr. HENRY. No; I am not going to dump him in the Gulf. I am going to take good care of CALLAWAY and keep him from harming himself if I can. [Laughter and applause.]

Now, I advise the gentleman to let these projects alone. I thank you, gentlemen of the committee, for your attention. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, it is not necessary for me to enter into any defense of the Brazos River. That has been done very effectively by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY].

I would like to call attention to just one item, or one remark made by the other Member from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY] in reference to the increasing expenditures during the past two years of Democratic administration over those of previous Republican administrations. It is none of the affairs of the gentlemen on this side of the aisle to find fault with Democratic extravagance. We applaud his extracts from the Democratic platforms, and very likely it will be found the party is living up to other planks as well as it is to the economy ones he has read.

I am very glad, indeed, that the river and harbor bill is not a partisan measure. It has been treated by the members of the committee and made up in an absolutely impartial and nonpartisan manner. My colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. MURRAY] a few days ago referred to the fact that Republicans and Democrats alike sat in all meetings of that committee, and as a Republican I wish to corroborate that statement. We were just as much a part of the committee as were the Democrats. But to come to the point of the remarks of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY], that this bill carries a larger appropriation than previous river and harbor bills, he was criticizing the fact that the bill is based, to a certain extent, on the reports of engineers, who are shown to be expert and absolutely impartial judges of the merits of these various propositions.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. TREADWAY. No; I do not yield. You would not yield to me yesterday, and I see no reason why I should yield to you now. [Laughter.] These engineers are absolutely nonpartisan. I also want to call still further attention to the fact that this bill, call it what you may—the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY] has frequently called it a pork barrel, but he can not prove it—is made up item by item, every item to be passed upon by this House upon its respective merits, and that is why the committee are glad to applaud the efforts of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY] and of the gentleman from Wisconsin on my left [Mr. FREAR] to study the items of this bill and ask for explanations of these various items. I do wish to call the attention of this committee particularly to the fact that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY], who objects to this method of preparing a bill, who assails the members of the committee, and claims that we are on the committee for our own private ends—whereas the items of the bill, compared with the districts from which the members of the committee come, show the contrary to be the fact—and I wish to call attention to the fact that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY] deliberately goes on record here in favor of a bill made up in a lump sum, taking from the Treasury of our country $25,000,000 in just one item. Now, if there is any claim of "pork barrel" and "steals" and that sort of thing to be made on this floor by the gentleman from Texas, let him defend his vote on the lump-sum good-roads bill for $25,000,000 in one fell scoop out of the Treasury of the United States. That is a different proposition, Mr. Chairman, from the method in which the river and harbor bill is made up—item by item. I think any gentleman who voted for that bill to which I refer—and this applies to some of the gentlemen who are criticizing this river and harbor bill—ought to be a little more consistent in his own style and method of procedure on this floor. [Applause.]

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may be allowed to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the Members of the House ought to be too harsh in their criticisms of my colleague from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY]. I think this is perhaps the third river and harbor bill that has been considered and passed since he became a Member. According to my recollection, he did not interpose any objection at all to the first one. To the second one he was rather mild in his opposition, but as to this one he is exceedingly strenuous in his attempts to defeat it. One of the projects toward which he seems especially hostile is the Trinity River. He could not even wait until the item was reached in the bill before he made an attack on it. Now, I think there is an explanation of the gentleman's attitude. He is opposed, as I take it, to navigation of any kind anywhere. He does not believe in it. I think the explanation is easy. I understand he went to Panama last year——

Mr. MADDEN. Has he ever been seasick?

Mr. BEALL of Texas. I was just coming to that. He went to Panama last year. He has been denominated here as a land terrapin, and of course he did not know anything about the billowy ocean. I am informed that as a consequence he was desperately seasick from the time he left New York Harbor until he reached Panama. He had a few days' rest there, and then started back and got seasick again. In the middle of the ocean somebody passing the cabin in which he was lying heard him groaning and praying, but being a wicked man, opposed to Trinity River navigation, the Lord would not listen to him. [Laughter.] So he was sick all the way back, and finally, as the boat steamed into New York Harbor, he managed to inject enough life into himself to come upon the deck. He beheld the Statue of Liberty in New York Harbor, and gazed upon it with admiring eyes. As the boat swept by he said, sadly, "Good-by, old goddess. If ever I look you in the face again you will have to turn around." [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, when the gentleman wants to engage in a head-cracking contest over the Trinity River I am ready for the fray. I do not know how to better describe the argument of my colleague than to apply to it the language in which he attempted to describe the Trinity River. He said it was narrow, shallow, and crooked. [Laughter.]

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. He said it was dry, too.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Yes; the description still fits the gentleman's argument. He said you can not navigate the Trinity River, that it is not a feasible, practical scheme. Who says it is not? My colleague from Texas.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Yes.

Mr. CALLAWAY. I never said it was not navigable. I said that according to the engineers' reports we would all be dead and buried before they navigated it.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. I understood the gentleman to say a good deal derogatory to Trinity River. Does my colleague concede, then, that it is a feasible, practicable scheme?

Mr. CALLAWAY. No; I do not concede anything about it.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Because if the gentleman concedes that, he gives away his argument. Who says it is not a feasible, practicable scheme? My friend from Texas. Who says that it is? Away back yonder in the fifties the Trinity River was examined under authority of the War Department, when Jefferson Davis was Secretary of War, and I am advised that the report made said that the navigation of the Trinity was feasible and practicable. In the seventies the project was examined again, and a report of similar character was made. In 1899 the War Department made another investigation, and Col. Riché made a report that was approved by the War Department, a report under which these subsequent appropriations have been secured. Three times the engineers of the War Department have passed upon the project, and in each instance they have said it was feasible and practicable. Against their reports the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY] sets up his individual opinion. The river rises in his district, but it gets out of it just as quickly as it can. [Laughter.]

Who says that its navigation is feasible and practicable? Five or six committees of this House of Representatives have said so by as often making appropriations for its improvement. Against the judgment of these committees, which was supported by the reports of the engineers, my colleague [Mr. CALLAWAY] opposes his own unsupported opinion. Five or six committees of the Senate have said so. The people of Texas have said so. Some years ago the Legislature of Texas memorialized Congress asking for aid for its improvement. The people of Dallas have emphasized the fact that they believe in the navigation of the Trinity River, because they have labored for many years in its behalf and have spent of their own money $150,000 in the effort to secure navigation of this river. They contributed to the Federal Government $66,000 at one time as an evidence of their faith.

The gentleman represents, as I stated before, a district through which one part of this river runs. Trinity River has three forks—East Fork joins the main stream about 50 miles below Dallas, Elm Fork at Dallas, and one fork runs into the gentleman's district. Who else favors the improvement of the Trinity River? I have here a telegram saying "Resolution passed by the Fort Worth Chamber of Commerce yesterday favoring the present appropriation and increased allotment; most unequivocal indorsement of Trinity River appropriation," and this from the chief city of his district. [Applause.] Fort Worth is something more than 30 miles up the river from Dallas, and yet her chamber of commerce is big enough to approve the project.

And yet he says, Mr. Chairman, that the improvement for navigation at Trinity River is not feasible or practicable.

Who else says so? Why, the facts of history say so, Mr. Chairman. I have here a letter written by a very old man, published in one of the Texas newspapers. I want to read a paragraph or two of it:

In the early forties and fifties—long before there was one mile of railroad in Texas—steamers ran almost every day on regular schedule between Galveston and Alfords Bluff and Magnolia, the latter about 10 miles west of Palestine, Anderson County, 2 miles from Fort Houston, for many years, and still the home of the sage of Texas—the great John H. Reagan. And I have seen as many as six large steamboats at one time lying at the wharves of Magnolia, then a flourishing town, receiving and discharging freight, 512 miles from Galveston; and often, if there was sufficient freight awaiting them, they would run up as far as Tellico, then the largest and most flourishing town in Ellis County, where a large cotton and woolen mill, owned by Col. Thomas McRay, then the only one in Texas, was successfully operated.

For 20 years I resided in Galveston, where I was a cotton factor and banker. For years I owned the two fine Trinity River steamers—the Ida Reese and Justice—carrying from 2,000 to 3,500 bales of cotton. In 1867 I saw two steamboats lying at the foot of Commerce Street in Dallas at one time—the Job, commanded by Capt. James McGarvey, of Galveston, and the Sallie Haynes, built in Dallas and named for the present wife of Gov. Barney Gibbs. Although I am only a mere kid, scarce three score years and ten, yet I can recall from memory the names of 100 steamboats I have seen plying on the placid waters of the Trinity. I will add a list of the steamers I can now recall—more than 100 in number—though doubtless I have forgotten the names of as many more, and will also give you for publication a list of the different steamboat landings between Dallas and Galveston, with the distances between. In the old days the distance was 894 miles, one of the longest navigable rivers in the United States.

He gives a list of the steamboats from memory, and here they are:

Names of Trinity River steamboats: Vesta, Belle of Texas, Josiah H. Bell, Texas, Silver Cloud, Black Cloud, Col. Stelle, Lucy Gwinn, Justice, Ida Reese, Pearl, Eva, Early Bird, C. B. Lee, Jack Hayes, Magnolia, Governor Pease, Nora, Como, Col. D. L. Cage, Republic, John J. Carr, John S. Sellers, Henry A. Jones, Correro, Trinity No. 1, 1839, Trinity No. 2, Star State, Grapeshot, Yellow Stone, Warsaw, Laura, Constitution, Lafayette, Galveston, Emblem, Sabine, Delrenott, Sparta, Albert Gallatin, Friend, Rufus, Palmetta, Sam Houston, Rodney, Dayton, City of Houston, Putnam, Mary Leonard, Eclipse, J. B. Sydnor, Ogden, Matamoros, Thos. N. McKinney, Orleans, Bay State, Frank T. Archer, Belle, Neptune No. 1, Neptune No. 2, Rob Ray, Buffalo, Reliance, Billow, General Harvey, Alice Swan, Cuero, Experiment, Lone Star, Belle Sulphur, Job, Mary Hill, A. S. Ruthven, Patrick Henry, Tennessee, Farmer, Bettie Powell, San Antonio, Crockett, Dr. J. C. Massie, W. R. Smith, Welshman, Brazos, Nick Hill, Shreveport, Lucy, Indian No. 1, Indian No. 2, John Jenkins, J. D. Hindes, Harris, Fort Henry, Mollie Hambleton, Camargo, Uncle Ben, Cleona, Sunflower, Diana, and Comanche.

You will notice that the very last one is named the Comanche. By a strange coincidence my friend from Texas comes from Comanche County, Tex. That leads me to speculate a little on Texas history. It is probable that the captain of the steamboat Comanche afterwards went out into west Texas and was instrumental in organizing the county in which my friend from Texas lives, and as a compliment to that county he called it the Comanche, naming it after a steamboat that was running on this river that the gentleman from Comanche now says never was navigated and never can be navigated. [Laughter.] "How sharper than a serpent's tooth it is to have a thankless child." [Laughter.]

Mr. CALLAWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Yes.

Mr. CALLAWAY. I said there had been no navigation of the Brazos or the Trinity Rivers in my time.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Well, some things have happened in the world before the gentleman's time, and many things will happen in the future that the genleman does not think will happen. It is true there has been no navigation of Trinity River for the last 30 or 40 years.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. GREGG. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks that his colleague's time be extended. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I think I shall not object, although it seems to me there is a manifest effort on the part of the President's friends to filibuster on this bill. [Laughter.] Since the bill was taken up for consideration to-day, and it is now half past 3, the most of that time has been taken by the friends of the President arguing about things of which there is no question. However, I shall not object to the request of the distinguished gentleman from Texas, who seldom addresses the House, but when he does, is always instructive and entertaining. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BUTLER. Will my friend permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. Are the Members of Congress from Texas desirous of having these items passed in this bill? If so, I would like to vote for them, but I have been sitting here for hours and hours waiting for the opportunity.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will soon have an opportunity to vote for these items just as 17 Members of the Texas delegation will vote for them.

Until the railroads were built the Trinity River was navigated. Cotton was carried by boat from that section of the State down to deep water. Many boats plied up and down the river. It is true that it was a difficult navigation. It is true that it was an uncertain kind of navigation, but under necessity the people of Texas employed the Trinity River as a means of reaching deep water. There is in existence to-day an old freight bill, issued by the Houston & Texas Central Railroad Co. years after it was constructed from the Gulf almost parallel with the Trinity River, showing that they carried cotton from Corsicana to deep water for 80 cents a bale. They carried it at that rate for the purpose of driving these boats off the river, for the purpose of making it impossible for any private enterprise to navigate that river and give to the people of that section of the State the benefit of cheap transportation. They succeeded. Boats could not compete with the railroad when they charged only 80 cents a bale for carrying cotton. The boats were driven off. For years and years the people of Texas paid $3 a bale to get cotton from that section of the State down to deep water. At this time it is costing the people of Texas in my section of the State $2.75 for every bale of cotton that is carried to deep water. How is it in other portions of the South? Take the Mississippi River. That is not navigated to any very great extent, yet the farmers of Tennessee are able to have their cotton sent from Memphis to deep water for from 80 cents to $1 a bale.

Texas is the great cotton-producing State of the Union. My own county, which adjoins the Trinity River, produced in 1912 nearly 180,000 bales of cotton. My district produced 500,000 or 600,000 bales of cotton during that year. The whole State of Texas produced nearly 5,000,000 bales of cotton. If we are able to secure the benefits of water transportation for that section of Texas, it will affect and regulate the freight rates upon two or three million bales of cotton. If it gives to us the same transportation rates that are given to the people of Memphis, it will save to the people of Texas enough in a single year to complete the canalization of the Trinity River.

Mr. Chairman, the only doubt there has ever been with respect to the canalization of that river has been with regard to the first 50 miles of it immediately below Dallas. That was an experiment. It was an experiment that, according to Mr. BURTON'S idea, the Government was justified in undertaking because of the acute freight-rate situation in that section of Texas. I went down that river with Mr. BURTON about seven or eight years ago. Other members of the Rivers and Harbors Committee who are here this afternoon accompanied us upon that trip. We went down to the junction of the two forks of the river. If that section could be improved by the construction of locks and dams at an expenditure of a few hundred thousand dollars, then the problem for that section of Texas with reference to transportation rates would promise to be solved. I heard Mr. BURTON, then chairman of the Rivers and Harbors Committee, say upon the occasion of that trip that nowhere in all the United States was the freight situation so distressing and so acute as in that section of Texas, and Mr. BURTON agreed to the appropriation for Trinity River in the hope that the improvement might be successful and that freight situation be relieved.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Yes.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Does not the gentleman know that freight rates have risen in Texas within the last 10 or 15 years, like everything else? I shipped a carload of lumber from Texarkana to where I live, in 1889, for 29 cents.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. There has been no such remarkable raise as the one I speak of, from 80 cents to $2.75 and $3 for cotton, in the last 25 or 30 years.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Freight rates have increased like the price of everything else.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. No; freight rates have not increased in that way. They were increased when competition with water rates was destroyed, but there has been no such increase as that within the last 20 or 30 years. The farmers of Tennessee can send their cotton to deep water for 75 cents to $1 a bale, while the people of the great State have to pay $2.75 a bale to get their cotton to deep water.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman guarantee that the railroad rates will be kept up so that the boats can live, if navigation is restored on the river?

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Oh, I can not guarantee anything; but we hope we will get the benefit of competition. We ask for the privilege of having some chance for competition with the railroads of Texas. We have an empire down there. It is not like some of these smaller States. This Trinity River runs 512 miles from Dallas through the very heart of Texas, a section of Texas, it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the Almighty must have created as an afterthought just to show what omnipotence could do. After He created all of the balance of the world He must have gathered together the best of all other lands and concentrated it there in that section of Texas, and through it He caused these rivers to run, and these rivers afford the only opportunity we have to secure to the people of Texas reasonable protection against exorbitant freight charges. [Applause.]

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Yes.

Mr. CALLAWAY. The gentleman heard me read from the engineer's report that these canalized rivers actually had to compete to make the railroads reduce their rates.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Yes; and we believe they will compete. They have succeeded in reducing rates elsewhere by water competition, and we pray that they may reduce them in Texas.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Does the gentleman believe that they will ever carry any freight to amount to anything on the Brazos River?

Mr. BEALL of Texas. I do not care how much freight they will carry. If they will carry enough to give water competition, all the people of Texas will be grateful.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALLAWAY. Is it not a fact that we are appropriating millions of dollars to get a physical valuation of the railroads of the country in order that the Interstate Commerce Commission can fix a reasonable rate?

Mr. BEALL of Texas. I am aware of all of that. I do not know what protection we will get in the future, but we are reaching out, groping in the dark, hoping and praying for some means of escape from the exorbitant exactions imposed on us at the present time. I now yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY].

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the gentleman that the reports of Cols. Jadwin and Riche that are before the gentleman there now show that in southern Texas there are a number of places where the railroads must compete with the water transportation as opposed to railroad transportation, and in every instance the railroad rates of freight have been reduced more than two-thirds, and there are numerous instances in these engineering reports showing all those things in the State of Texas.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. I thank my colleague for the suggestion.

Mr. Chairman, so many people attempt to grow humorous at the expense of Trinity River.

There is no humor in the situation to the people in that part of Texas. I know that it sounds humorous to talk about an artificial supply of water, and yet the river and harbor bill a year or two ago provided for an investigation of the impounding of waters to make reservoirs at the head of the Mississippi River, and a survey was in contemplation for the establishment of reservoirs to furnish and supplement an artificial supply of water for the Ohio River. The same thing has been done with respect to other rivers, and it is a matter of frequent occurrence in other countries. Dozens of canals in England, France, and Germany secure all or part of their water supply by pumping, and in some instances the supply is supplemented by artesian wells.

As I say, it is not a humorous situation for us down there, where we are confronted with a disastrous rate situation, and in our anxiety to find some avenue of escape, some method of relief, the people of Texas have urged the improvement of the Brazos and Trinity Rivers. If they can not be improved, then there seems no chance of escape for us.

We have a railroad commission which fixes freight rates. If it reduces them, the railroads carry the question to the Federal court, and some Federal judge grants an injunction restraining the commission from enforcing the rates. The only chance for escape we have is in some way to get the benefit of water transportation, and the Trinity and Brazos Rivers afford us the only opportunity and the only hope of securing any relief.

Mr. Chairman, I do not fall out with my colleague [Mr. CALLAWAY] because of his attacks upon this bill or the item in it affecting Trinity River. I respect and esteem him far too much for that to occur. During a service here of nearly 12 years I have met and known many men of sincerity, courage, honesty, integrity, and patriotism, but I have never met one into whose nature these elements seemed to me more interwoven than they are into his. I honor him for his steadfastness to what he conceives to be right and for his constant loyalty to what he believes to be the public interest, and I hope that his country may have the benefit of his patriotic service for many years yet to come. I think, though, he is mistaken in his attitude toward Trinity River.

He says it is too narrow. It is narrow. It is narrower than the Mississippi and many other rivers, but it is not so narrow that it was not successfully navigated in the past and that it may not be in the future. Some rivers, like some people, are entirely too broad.

He says it is too crooked. It is crooked. It is a habit into which rivers have fallen. All that I have ever known have been crooked. The Missouri is crooked. But many crooked rivers can be navigated with certainty and ease.

He says it is too shallow. It is a shallow river in places. So are most other rivers. The Mississippi above Cairo is shallow at places, so shallow that sometimes it can be navigated only by boats drawing 5 feet or less. The River Rhine for a great distance has a mean low-water depth of only 4 feet. The Danube River from Kehlheim to Regensburg has a depth of only 4½ to 5 feet. The River Seine before its canalization had a depth at Rouen of only 2½ feet and at other places of only 2 feet. The River Elba, one of the important waterways of Europe, has a high-water navigable depth of 6 feet. In its ordinary water condition it can carry vessels having a draft of 4½ feet, while with low water boats can not run upon it having a draft of more than 3½ feet.

Yet these rivers I have named are some of the great rivers of the world, and each of them is now carrying a great commerce. Half of the canals of Europe have a water depth of less than 6 feet. The completion of Lock and Dam No. 1, 12 miles below Dallas, has already conclusively demonstrated that a depth of 8 feet at Dallas can be secured and maintained.

It is said that the water supply is uncertain and that in periods of extreme drought navigation upon the Trinity River might be suspended. I concede that this condition might occur. It has happened in connection with the Ohio and many other rivers, and will probably occur again; and yet this is no reason why the improvement of such rivers should be discontinued. Many rivers in the colder sections of this country are frozen over, sometimes for two or three months, or longer, during winter, and such a condition is an absolute bar to navigation. So far as navigation is concerned, the Trinity River in a period of drought will be in no worse condition that these other rivers that are frozen. In fact, the situation of the Trinity will be better, because such periods of drought are of infrequent occurrence, while many rivers are obstructed by ice each winter.

So, Mr. Chairman, I submit the case of Trinity River to the judgment of the committee. If it were straight and broad and deep, it would not need improvement, because it would then be navigable and would be navigated without the aid of any appropriation. We must take it as it is. Because it is not so straight as we would like it to be, not so broad as we would wish it, and not so deep as it might be, we come asking for help upon the plea that it is the best we have, and it, with the Brazos, affords the only chance we have for water competition within the State of Texas. If these projects should fail to secure the hoped for results, we will grieve far more than you because of such failure, because to you it will mean only that the Federal Treasury has lost the sum appropriated. It will also mean that to us, and, in addition, it will mean that our State must continue to be shackled and bound. The people of Texas have done their best to protect themselves, and for the generous assistance extended by Congress they are duly grateful.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, in a speech I delivered on the 16th of January last, in opposition to the proposed increase in freight rates in official classification territory, I made the following statement:

> It is of record that the Consolidation Coal Co., a large producer and shipper of coal in West Virginia and Kentucky, is much quoted as favoring the increase in rates "because the railroads need it," but the fact that this company is in reality a subsidiary of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. is not given equal prominence.

Mr. Chairman, my authority for that statement was the report of the Interstate Commerce Commission under the Tillman-Gillespie resolution, dated January 25, 1907.

But I am informed by Senator CHILTON, of that State, that while the facts were as I stated them to be from the report referred to at the time it was made, that such were not the facts at the date of my speech, and I take this opportunity to set myself right, and in justice to the coal company, by reading the following statement of facts given me by Senator CHILTON, of West Virginia:

> On April 26, 1906, Messrs. Clarence W. Watson, Jere H. Wheelwright, and H. Crawford Black bought from the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. all that company's holding of stock in the Consolidation Coal Co., viz, 53,532 shares out of 102,500 shares outstanding, or 52.2 per cent of the whole.
>
> The shares were transferred to the Windsor Trust Co., of New York, as trustee, to hold as security for the payment of the purchase money and interest thereon. The right to vote the stock vested in the purchasers, subject only to interference by the trustee on complaint of the railroad company in case the management of the coal company diverted tonnage.
> Of the 53,532 shares, 43,000 shares are still held by the trustee. In 1909 the purchase agreement was supplemented, the purchasers depositing additional shares simply as collateral, agreeing to withdraw 13,000 shares on or before April 30, 1916, and being accorded the right to withdraw the balance of the 43,000 shares at the rate of 6,250 shares per year thereafter.
> In May, 1909, the capital stock of the company was increased to 200,000 shares, and in October, 1910, was further increased to 250,000 shares of $25,000,000 par value, which had been sold at par and all of which is now outstanding, so that the 43,000 shares originally purchased from the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. and still held by the trustee represents but 17.2 per cent of the voting shares of the coal company. The Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. owns or votes no shares whatever.
> The operations of the Consolidation Coal Co. are not confined to the Baltimore & Ohio system. In 1908 the Consolidation Coal Co. purchased over 32,000 acres of coal land on the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Co., in Johnson County, Ky., known as the Millers Creek coal field. This operation, which is now a large one, is exclusively on the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway.
> In 1910 the Consolidation Coal Co. purchased 100,000 acres of the highest grade by-product coking coal in the United States, situated in the eastern part of Kentucky, and known as the Elkhorn coal field. To reach the western part of this field, on account of its remarkable quality, the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co. built a new line from their existing line at Jackson, Ky., a distance of 98 miles.
> Both of these properties have been developed, and are capable of producing a large tonnage of coal. In the purchase of coal lands and in the improvements on these two roads alone the Consolidation Coal Co. has already expended $8,000,000.

Mr. FREAR rose.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would like to have five minutes.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Then, Mr. Chairman, I make the request 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I have been very much interested in listening to the character of debate during the last hour. No one will charge the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY] or myself with having filibustered to-day, as has been already stated by the gentleman from Illinois. I have been interested in listening to the arguments made by the gentlemen from Texas against the position taken by their colleague [Mr. CALLAWAY], and, in my judgment, they have avoided in every case the very proposition he has put to them. I wish they would answer his statement. Let us see the situation in Texas. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY] says you have been 12 years at this proposition—Trinity River. Is that true?

Mr. CALLAWAY. Yes.

Mr. FREAR. Let us see. Forty-one years more will be required for the project. Think of it. Why have not you answered that statement?

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. HENRY. The gentleman did not hear me. I said that on the Brazos River——

Mr. FREAR. Oh, I am talking about Trinity.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. What is the gentleman's question?

Mr. FREAR. Why do you not answer his statement that you will not have freight rates reduced for 41 years?

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. FREAR. I can not yield again.

Mr. HENRY. I know you could not answer me, but I wanted the gentleman to yield to me. [Laughter.]

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, do not take this out of my time. No; I can not yield.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. No; I can not; my time is too limited.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. I thought that the gentleman demanded that somebody from Texas answer him?

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I can not answer two or three questions at once.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. I thought the gentleman wanted an answer.

Mr. FREAR. For 41 years the people of Texas are to wait before they can get a reduction of freight rates. You had navigation on the river before the war, but it has disappeared years ago. It is true in my own home, as it is true of my friend's here, we do not have anything on the river—no navigation—although the river is large enough for large river boats. This is because the railroads have driven it all away. The boats can not compete for the traffic. You have got the best railroad commission in the United States, with one exception, in Texas. It has full power to relieve unjust conditions. Wisconsin took its law from Texas. When you had Mr. Reagan for its chairman, he gave you a strong, effective law, and if you deserve a reduction in freight rates, you can get it; but you ought not to receive it if you do not deserve it, because when you get a reduction that is not reasonable you throw the burden upon some other shipper who is not blessed with canalized streams. But why wait 41 years for this reduction? There has been some talk here about highways by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY].

Mr. HENRY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FREAR. If the gentleman will obtain for me extra time.

It has been stated we made an appropriation of $25,000,000 for highways, but every State that gets a dollar of benefit for highways pays an equal amount. It is to be of substantial benefit to millions of people. Why does not Texas pay $4,000,000 in the improvement of this creek that is going to be good 41 years from to-day, 41 years hence? Now, this is a question of fairness; we are not interested in objecting to anything that is reasonable. For Galveston I would fight as quickly as anyone, or for any deserving project; but it seems to me that when we appropriate four million and some odd dollars and have to wait 41 years before we can ever get a reduction in freight rates on the river it is inexcusable. You can criticize your colleague or you can criticize me; it is immaterial. But we have been troubled with pork barrels in every Congress; this is one of the worst.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, when the State of Texas gets on the boards we may expect something big to be done; then the real problem is sure to come to the front. Great is Texas thus to present to us the real thing, the real nub of this whole issue, the real reason why we ought to adopt this bill, and that is to reduce railroad rates. That is the real purpose of this bill, a reduction of railroad rates. I favor the improvement of these harbors and I am a supporter of this bill; I am not opposing that. But I am reminding members of this committee of the fact that President Wilson suggested a reduction of railroad rates when he was a candidate for President. He said it was essential to reduce railroad rates and he pledged his party to that issue. "The Democratic platform is not molasses to catch flies," he said, "it means business." He proposed to curb the power of the railroads. He girded on his armor, as it were, and sallied forth to fight for rate reduction.

So these Texans to-day propose to improve their harbors, as well as all the other harbors of the country, to reduce rates, and they declare this to be a fundamental proposition. But I want to call attention to the fact that I find yesterday there was introduced in the RECORD a statement evidencing the fact that the President of the United States has agreed that railroad rates are already too low; that railroad rates of this country are so low that they must be made higher; and that it is essential to assess the people a higher transportation tax than has been assessed before. Are we witnessing another instance of insubordination on the part of House Members?

There are three billions in tolls collected annually from the American people by this octopus that gentlemen have been talking about and saying that it is essential to reduce the rates by improving water transportation and that this river and harbor bill is going to reduce the rates. Cotton, bearing a rate of $3.75 a bale, is to be reduced to 60 cents a bale; yet the administration claims that the railroads will starve on the present rates, the railroads will go to pieces at the price they are now receiving for their transportation. If that is true, then why attempt to reduce the rates? Are we going to find some further means of benefiting the railroads to make up for this reduction? Shall we give them a subsidy or a land grant, or do something to stifle coastwise competition? I want to take advantage of this opportunity to call attention to the injustice of attempting through the Interstate Commerce Commission to raise the rates, that have already been declared to be too high and declared to be oppressive, and thus increase the three billions of dollars that are collected annually from the people of this country and paid to the few men who own the railroads. I feel that there is very little satisfaction to be had or that very little relief will come to the people from any reduction in rates this bill may bring about as long as the administration insists that the rates are too low already and that they must be increased. The railroads, they say, are the barometer of business. When they prosper everybody prospers. In order to bring this prosperity to the people via the pockets of the Morgans, the Goulds, the Vanderbilts, and the Hills, they propose to increase the heavy burden of the people by raising transportation taxes. The President says no more about his plans to reduce railroad rates, but proclaims a "constitution of peace" and calls for the Interstate Commerce Commission and approves the plans of the railroads to increase the people's burden.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving channel from Pass Cavallo to Port Lavaca, Tex.: For maintenance, $5,000.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto be closed in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent that debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto be closed in five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I knew when I jumped on the Trinity and the Brazos Rivers it would raise a storm. I knew that we would have a flamboyant speech from the gentleman from Waco and a most earnest defense by the gentleman from Dallas; but that has nothing to do with the soundness of the proposition that I laid down, as shown by the engineer's report. They need not get uneasy about these items. I am not going to strike any of them out. I want every Texas item to stay in this bill. If Matawan Creek and the Little Peedee River and other projects are to stay in the bill, I want every Texas item to stay in, and they will stay in. I called the attention of the committee to the Texas items because they were items of which I knew something personally. I am not going to strike out the Texas items and consent to leaving in items for Matawan Creek and Kissimee Creek and the Little Peedee River and the Lumber River, and all the other lootings in the bill—not on your life. I will be by this exactly as I was with the public-buildings bill when I went before the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with reference to a public building in my own town. They asked me if I was going to vote for the bill. I told them that I was not going to vote for it. They said, "Well, guess we had better strike out the item." I said, "Strike it out and give that as the reason why you did not put it in." [Applause.] I went down home and they gave me a banquet. I made a speech and said, "You people have not banqueted me on anything else I have done since I have been in Congress, and this is the only questionable thing I have done since I have been there." [Laughter.]

They know there will never be any navigation on these rivers. The people of the country have been generally led to believe if they can get a boat of any kind over the river they would get better rates. One of the Texas Members has been arguing with me that railroads have been lowering the rates at the water points below the actual carriage cost and raising them at the interior points, in order to make up their loss at the water points. If they do that, what an outrage it is on the people of the interior. Not only do they pay the money out on rivers to lower the rates at the benefited points, but also suffer a raise at the interior points to make up the loss to the railroad companies at the competing points. And that is a system of statesmanship which governs us from day to day.

Of course the constituents of these gentlemen from Dallas and Waco are interested in having the money poured out there, and they have got to stand for it. I know that. They present a statement from some of my constituents at Fort Worth. Those constituents have been misled. They believe they will get lower freight rates because of it. People all over the country have been led to believe that. The engineers reporting on these projects say you can not have lower railroad rates unless you have real, active water competition.

Mr. HENRY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALLAWAY. I will in a minute. When this Government is what it ought to be we will make the rail rates reasonable. You can not make them lower than reasonable. We are now at work on the proposition of physical valuation of railroads in order that we may make freight rates reasonable. We are developing rivers to make the railways give reasonable rates and at the same time are obtaining the physical valuation of railways to enable our Interstate Commerce Commission to fix rates. If we are to have competition from Dallas to the Gulf, why not have a sane proposition? The gentleman can build a railroad at $20,000 a mile from Dallas to the Gulf of Mexico, and he can build it in two years and not wait until his children are old and grayheaded, and have real competition. I stated that, according to this engineer's report and the way they were appropriating for this project, it would be 41 years yet before that project was completed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CALLAWAY. I ask unanimous consent for one minute more in order that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] may ask me a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY] asks unanimous consent that his time be extended one minute. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HENRY. Does not the gentleman know a carload of freight can be shipped from St. Louis over the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railroad, through the town of Fort Worth, in his district, to Galveston, and they can carry cheaper, on account of the water rate, to Galveston than it can be shipped to Fort Worth?

Mr. CALLAWAY. That argument is made to the people sometimes, but it does not appeal to me.

I want to close this statement I was making here by saying that there can be no commerce on the Trinity River until the Trinity River is canalized from stem to stern, according to this engineer's report.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALLAWAY. Here are the statistics from the engineer's report: There is no commerce and none can be developed until the entire river is canalized. They have begun at the head and are going toward the mouth with their canalization, and at $200,000 a year it will take them 41 years yet to expend the $8,000,000 estimated as necessary to complete this project.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Colorado River, Tex.: Completing improvement in accordance with the report submitted in Rivers and Harbors Committee Document No. 3, Sixty-third Congress, first session, and subject to the conditions set forth in said document, $25,000.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY] moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I wanted to complete the statement I started to make a little while ago.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto be closed in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN] asks unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Texas permit an interruption right there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from South Carolina?

Mr. CALLAWAY. Yes.

Mr. RAGSDALE. The gentleman took occasion repeatedly to refer to the Little Peedee River, which carries a small appropriation of $12,000. I would like the gentleman to leave Texas for a moment and tell us why the animus toward this small appropriation?

Mr. CALLAWAY. It was only 5 to 6 inches deep. I thought it so ridiculous to try to navigate a stream only 5 to 6 inches deep. [Laughter.]

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman a question. Why is it called the Little Peedee and the Lumber River? Why does a little river like that have two names?

Mr. RAGSDALE. It is called the Lumber River in North Carolina and the Little Peedee in South Carolina.

Mr. MURDOCK. I should think that river should get together. [Laughter.]

Mr. RAGSDALE. That river is in the exact condition of the Republican and Progressive Parties—they can not get together. [Laughter.]

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, the whole argument here on the part of these navigators of rivers and makers of canals is that it will lower freight rates by having a competing line. Now, I do not think I had reached the statement that I wanted to make, namely, that I had made an estimate of what a real railroad would cost from Dallas, Tex., to the Gulf of Mexico. It is 240 miles direct. It is 520 miles by the crooks of the river. They can build a real railroad from Dallas to the Gulf for $5,000,000. They can do it now, and they can have transportation on that now; and they can not only compete with the other railroads in carrying freight, but they can actually demonstrate that one-half of the money laid out on this river would cover the cost of building a railroad, and by building that railroad you could demonstrate what the actual cost of railroad transportation would be, and by that means you could determine throughout the whole country, where conditions are similar, what the freight rates ought to be.

Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to his colleague?

Mr. CALLAWAY. Yes.

Mr. BURGESS. Are you in favor of that appropriation to build a railroad?

Mr. CALLAWAY. I would at least favor it rather than this project. I would rather build a railroad at a cost of $5,000,000 that would transport freight than attempt to improve the Trinity River at a cost of $10,000,000 and get no transportation.

Mr. BURGESS. Is the gentleman in favor of building that railroad?

Mr. CALLAWAY. As the gentleman puts it, as between the two propositions, yes; as any other sensible man would be. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Arkansas River, Ark. and Okla.: Continuing improvement and for maintenance, including works at Pine Bluff and the completion and operation of dredging plant, $164,700.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee something about this paragraph. How far up the river is the Arkansas now improved?

Mr. SPARKMAN. It is being improved up to Ozark, I believe.

Mr. MURDOCK. Up to Ozark?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes. Up to Fort Smith.

Mr. MURDOCK. What is the final estimate for this work?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I will say to the gentleman that that is one of these indefinite appropriations. The engineers recommend so much each year, when they make any recommendation at all, and it is mainly for snagging purposes. The work in some streams, you know, you never can finish.

Mr. MURDOCK. I will say to the gentleman that I live and have lived all my life on the upper waters of what was once a river of noble dimensions, the Arkansas River. Now, Colorado has taken most of the water out for irrigation purposes. In my youth a considerable stream, to-day at my town it is hardly a stream at all, except in the spring freshets. Now, how are the engineers improving that river up to Ozark—by pulling the snags and riprapping and winging the banks so that the channel will be worn by scouring?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I do not think much riprapping is being done. It is mainly snagging.

Mr. MURDOCK. Is this $164,700 a year spent for snagging?

Mr. SPARKMAN. The gentleman is now referring to locks and dams, is he not?

Mr. MURDOCK. I do not know. I want to find out. I did not know that there were any locks and dams in this proposition.

Mr. SPARKMAN. One hundred and ninety-four thousand dollars is appropriated for Locks and Dams Nos. 2, 4, 6, and 8 on the Ouachita River.

Mr. MURDOCK. This expenditure is largely for locks?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I thought the gentleman was referring to open-channel work.

Mr. MURDOCK. It may interest this committee to know that as a boy I watched workingmen, under the direction of Government engineers, riprapping the Arkansas at Wichita. My understanding at the time was that an appropriation of $50,000 was made annually for the improvement of the river up to that point, looking to navigation. In that day, it may further interest the chairman of the committee to know, there were many days in the year when it was possible for a boy of ordinary stature to wade the stream. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPARKMAN. The gentleman thinks it is not a very promising stream?

Mr. MURDOCK. It is not possible, in my opinion, to make the Arkansas River navigable in my part of the country, and I doubt whether they are going to make it navigable much west of the Arkansas line.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I take it that the gentleman is not in favor of the further improvement of the stream?

Mr. MURDOCK. For the upper reaches of the river it is probably not practical. I wanted to know how far west this improvement was to be made and just what this $164,700 is for. I understand the gentleman to say it is for locks and dams.

Mr. SPARKMAN. One hundred and ninety-four thousand dollars is for locks and dams.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. MURDOCK. I will say to the gentleman from Mississippi that I am talking about the Arkansas River.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The chairman was talking about the Ouachita.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I thought the gentleman was talking about the Ouachita.

Mr. MURDOCK. Oh, no; I am talking about the Arkansas.

Mr. SPARKMAN. It is for the completion of a dredging plant.

Mr. MURDOCK. Is this sum of $164,000 merely for the purpose of pulling snags out of the sand?

Mr. SPARKMAN. To get ready for that class of work.

Mr. MURDOCK. I will say to the gentleman from Florida that I stand appalled at the size of that item for that purpose.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. There is more than $1,000,000 of commerce on that river now.

Mr. MURDOCK. Up to what point?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. On the Arkansas River, up to Ozark.

Mr. MURDOCK. What is the nature of the commerce?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. It amounts to 71,000 tons and is worth more than $1,000,000. So the gentleman will see it is a reasonably valuable commerce.

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman in charge of the bill yield?

Mr. MURDOCK. I have the time. I will yield.

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. Just for a statement. The Arkansas River has always been navigable to a very profitable extent up as far as Muskogee, or the nearest point to Muskogee, Fort Gibson.

Mr. MURDOCK. Does this appropriation of $164,000 for the pulling of snags out of the sand include the river improvement clear up to Muskogee?

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. I do not know, but it ought to, and if it requires a greater appropriation than that, it ought to be made, because the river ought to be kept clean as far up as Fort Gibson, and I think it very probable that it could be navigated still farther.

Mr. MURDOCK. I suggest to the gentleman that he had better look to the State of Colorado, which is taking the water for irrigation. There will not be water enough left to grow snags in, if he does not look out.

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. Oh, I do not know. We have many streams running into the Arkansas River below the Ouachita.

Mr. MURDOCK. Not very many.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Chairman, I wish to refer to what the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY] said about the Little Peedee River.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAGSDALE. For the information of the gentleman from Texas I wish to let him know that this Little Peedee River traverses a section of country that is absolutely cut off from the railroads, and the residents along that river are dependent on it for the handling of their freight. And to inform the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK], I will say to him that the Lumber and Little Peedee River is just like some people I know. There are some people who at home—in Kansas—were known as Republicans, who afterwards got to be known in Washington as Progressives. Now, they are just like this Lumber and Little Peedee River. It changes its name according to locality, but it does it without receiving any intimation from the "big stick" that such change is desirable. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Big Sandy River, W. Va. and Ky.: For completing guide wall below Lock No. 1, $25,000.

[Mr. LANGLEY addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Ohio River: Continuing improvement and for maintenance by open-channel work, $350,900.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out lines 6 and 7, page 39, and inserting the following:

"Improving the Ohio River: Continuing improvement, for maintenance of open-channel work, $358,900: Provided, That of this sum $8,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be for the improvement of the navigation of the river at Jeffersonville and the protection of Government property by repairing the Government levees at said place."

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, this is the first time that I have attempted to occupy any of the time of the committee in the consideration of this bill.

As has been said by other Members on the floor of the House, I offer no criticism whatever upon the River and Harbor Committee. I went before the committee, made my argument for this item—only $8,000—and the committee saw fit to refuse it. In order that the Committee of the Whole may have some information about this I would like to give a brief history of this improvement. Jeffersonville, Ind., is located upon the north bank of the Ohio River immediately opposite the city of Louisville, Ky. It is a city of some 18,000 or 20,000 people. Shortly after the war the Government constructed a quartermaster's depot at that place, which has grown from year to year, until to-day I believe it is conceded to be the largest quartermaster's depot in the United States. It covers about 17 acres of ground, almost solidly occupied by buildings.

On July 5, 1884, Congress passed a law appropriating $50,000 for the improvement of the river at that place. The language of the act is as follows:

Improving the Ohio River: Continuing improvement, $600,000, of which sum $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be for the improvement of the navigation of the river at Jeffersonville and the protection of the Government property.

That was in 1884. The levee is about 6,000 feet long. Its original cost was $49,500. From that day until this the Government has never expended one dollar upon the levee. Before the Government threw a shovelful of dirt at that place it exacted a deed from the owners of the real estate upon which the levee was built, and the title to the levee is to-day in the Government of the United States. As I said a moment ago, while it has needed repairs for years, yet there has never been one penny of money expended by the Government in the maintenance of it.

Mr. Chairman, this is a small item, yet I do contend in all seriousness and candor that it is a meritorious one. It comes before this committee, as it went before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, recommended by the Board of Army Engineers. I desire to read the recommendations of Col. Charles E. Hammel, who worked and operated out of the office of Col. Jarvis at Cincinnati. He was sent over the levee last October at the request of the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and he makes the following report:

Condition of levee: Commencing at Penn and Court Streets at the northeasterly end of the levee and continuing to the intersection of Penn Street and Cherry Alley the top of the levee has been worn out to a depth of 2 feet by wagon and foot traffic. This should be repaired.

What stronger language, Mr. Chairman, could be used than is used here in recommending this item? If the Board of Army Engineers or Chief of Engineers dominates and controls the river and harbor bill, as I concede it does, why should not this settle it?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. For a question.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The gentleman says the engineers recommended this; they do not recommend the Government's repairing it. Do they not say it is not in the interest of navigation?

Mr. COX. Let me continuing the reading:

Continuing from Penn Street to Fulton Street, the top of the levee has been worn off by foot traffic to a depth of about 2 feet; the river side of the levee has been gradually washed by the action of the waves and the rain to a depth of about 2 feet; this should be replaced.

I do not care upon what ground you put it. I do not care a rap whether you put it on the ground that it is in the interest or not in the interest of navigation or the protection of Government property. If the Government of the United States recognizes this as being its property, and it must recognize it, otherwise it would not advocate the report, so I do not care which horn of the dilemma you take—we are entitled to this appropriation if it be Government property, and the engineer so recognizes it when he reports that this should be repaired. Let me read again:

From Fulton Street to Mechanic Street the top of the river side of the levee has been worn and washed to a depth of about 2 feet; this should be replaced.

From Mechanic Street to Meigs Avenue the levee is protected by a grass slope on the side toward the city, but the top and river side has been worn and washed to a depth of about 2½ feet, due to rains and the fact that this section was exposed to heavy waves during the high water of April, 1913. On account of exposure to the river at this section I would suggest about 2½ feet of fill on the top and river side of the levee and stone paving on the river side from tow to top side of the river slope.

Then he goes on and speaks of the levee from Watt Alley to Mulberry Street being out of repair. I do not care, as I said a moment ago, whether this appropriation be bottomed on the theory that it is an aid to navigation or whether it be bottomed on the theory that it is Government property and the Government recognizes its duty to maintain it and protect it. The duty is here and the recommendation says it ought to be repaired and replaced. It is in a measure an aid to navigation. That was the theory upon which the law was originally passed. That law is on the statute books to-day.

Without this levee being maintained at the height it should be maintained in extraordinary high water, such as occurred in 1884 and last spring, it would be impossible to reach the Government depot at such time. Now, it might be maintained here that with the levee at the present stage the height is sufficient to keep out high water, but I want to say to the chairman of the committee, if he advances that argument, that it is unsound and untrue.

There is situated in that city a reformatory with from 1,300 to 1,500 men in it. If it had not been last spring that the governor of the State by executive order turned loose, or turned over to the city administration, all the convicts who for eight days and nights fought back the flood, the quartermaster's depot at Jeffersonville would have been submerged from 5 to 11 feet.

This is a small item, gentlemen; it is a small concern. I do appeal to this committee to vote it in here. If I misquote anyone, I hope the chairman will correct me. I was told that there was several other projects pending, and that if mine went in the others had to go in, too. Now, I voice the sentiment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] this morning that every project should stand upon its own feet. If it is a meritorious project, whether it carries much or little, put it into the bill, but do not undertake to logroll against a few men in this House. I ask this committee to support this measure and vote it in.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I regret exceedingly that my sense of duty compels me to oppose this amendment. It is not only unnecessary so far as the Government is concerned but the project has been reported upon adversely by the engineers. I want to say in advance, however, that Congress has never, except in isolated cases, gone outside of the Mississippi River in the matter of levee building. I say only in isolated instances has it been done, and in recent years when done at least the items have been put on in the Senate, but I believe they have not concerned the Ohio River.

This matter was referred to the engineers last year, and all who dealt with it at all passed adversely upon it. The gentleman has read a report from an assistant engineer.

Mr. COX. Is he not connected with the Engineers' Department?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes.

Mr. COX. You do not regard him as an interloper?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Oh, no; not an interloper; but he is only an assistant engineer. The gentleman called him "colonel," and one would get the impression that he was a high official; but that makes no difference.

Mr. COX. I do not know anything about his title, but was he not sent out there by Col. Jervey?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Col. Jervey says that, in his opinion, the levee at Jeffersonville exerts no beneficial effect on navigation of the Ohio River, although it may aid in giving access through the river front to the quartermaster's depot in Jeffersonville. In another report he says that the streets leading from the Ohio River to the quartermaster's depot were submerged during the flood of 1884 to a depth of 5 to 7 feet. But, mark you, it was after that time the appropriation of 1884 was made.

With that appropriation, and possibly one other, although I think that was the only one, the embankment was raised so as to protect the Government property; and that was the only purpose of the appropriation at that time.

Further on he says:

That streets leading from the Ohio River to the quartermaster's depot were submerged during the flood of 1884 to a depth of from 5 to 7 feet, but that the construction of the Government levee—in conjunction with the Pennsylvania Railroad embankment—has prevented the flooding of such streets except where seepage occurs through the Pennsylvania Railroad embankment, so that the work there is sufficient to protect all the Government property. The flood of 1913 did not go over it, lacked 2 or more feet of going over the embankment the Government erected.

Further on he says:

In my opinion the repair of the levee is not necessary for the protection of the depot, and is not desired for the improvement of navigation in the Ohio River. It is probably a matter of local importance to have the levee restored to its original condition. The levee is of sufficient section to keep out of the city streets a flood equal to that of 1884, the highest known flood. The repairs needed are minor, due to gradual deterioration of crown and slopes and age of flood gates.

Mr. Chairman, in the face of these reports there is no justification whatever for making this appropriation, and if we were to do it we would be going in the face of the Government engineers, we would be embarking upon a scheme the end of which no one can see. We have Government engineers' reports for the work on the Mississippi River. We know what the cost there is going to be, or at least we think we know, but on the Ohio River there is no estimate as to cost, and we do not know what the final cost would be. I should like to aid my friend, but can not see my way clear to do so now.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, we have just witnessed the inspiring spectacle of the great watchdog of the Treasury, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox], coming in here and asking an appropriation—the distinguished gentleman who talks economy, who has been against every proposition. Another idol is shattered. He turns out to be just the ordinary reformer, who is against the "pork barrel" except when he can get his hand into it himself. He comes here now and pleads with the committee, after talking economy all these days and years upon the floor of the House, to give him an appropriation. He not only does that, but he comes and asks that we make an appropriation for a project that the engineer says is not necessary, either to protect Government property or in the interest of navigation. He is so exceedingly hungry to get something for himself that he opposes everything for everybody else, and then asks this House to violate all of the rules and make an exception in his case. I noticed a little while ago that my great economical friend who has done so much preaching on the floor of this House went through the tellers to assist the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER], and I now see the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi is here; I suppose, to assist him.

Mr. COLLIER. I am always in the House, am I not?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Oh, these pork barrel reformers. They are opposed to everything except when they get a part of it themselves. My distinguished friend from Indiana [Mr. Cox] a few moments ago said he approved of what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] said a while ago. Why, the distinguished gentleman from Illinois a while ago, in a moment of forgetfulness, mentioned the Democratic platform, and said it ought to be followed. I wonder how long my friend from Indiana [Mr. Cox] will follow the Democratic platform? Is he going to follow the Democratic platform in the next vote that is going to be taken? Will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] follow the Democratic platform? What part of the Democratic platform is to be regarded? How much of it is left? Have you heard from the White House to-day? Do you know how many planks there are in it you approve now? If so, how many will you approve in the morning? [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment. All I wish to do is to introduce a part of page 280 of the report of the Commissioner of Corporations on transportation by water in the United States, which refers to the traffic on the Ohio River and tributaries. I introduce it at this point because it has a relation to the next paragraph which will be debated. It is only a short paragraph. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by introducing section 8, appearing on page 280 of the report of the Commissioner of Corporations of July 19, 1909, referring to the transportation on the Ohio River.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The portion of the report referred to is as follows:

SECTION 8. TOTAL TRAFFIC ON THE OHIO RIVER AND TRIBUTARIES.

It is impossible to make an accurate statement of the total commerce of the Ohio River and its tributaries. A board of engineers of the United States Army appointed to examine the Ohio River estimated the total of both through and local shipments on the main stream at approximately 9,000,000 tons annually. Detailed statistics of freight traffic by steamers and coal companies compiled by the United States engineers, however, show a total movement on the Ohio River in 1905 of 13,163,656 tons and in 1906 of 11,427,784 tons. A third estimate, based on the following table of freight shipments and receipts at the various ports on the Ohio River (excluding tributaries), indicates a movement in 1905 of 13,955,928 tons. In presenting this table to the board of engineers referred to above, the secretary of the Ohio Valley Improvement Association, by whom much of the data was compiled, says:

"It is proper to say that, in the opinion of the writer, who has been connected for 30 years with the traffic of the Ohio River, some of the figures show that they are exaggerated, while others are underestimated. It is further the belief of the undersigned that the figures as a whole can be considered as fairly accurate."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. Cox) there were—ayes 13, noes 31.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 39, add a new paragraph to follow line 7, as follows:

"To repair and improve the Government levee on the Ohio River, at Jeffersonville, Ind., and to protect Government property, $8,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, on that I reserve the point of order.

Mr. COX. Make the point of order.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that this proposition is the same matter that was just voted on in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 39, after line 7, by adding as a separate paragraph the following:

"For improving the harbor, Ohio River, and levee at Shawneetown, Ill., $100,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, on that I reserve the point of order.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment because of the necessity of the case, and in doing so I have no disposition to find fault with any member of the committee or the chairman thereof in passing upon this question while before the committee. Mr. Chairman, this amendment involves a proposition which, if carried in this bill, will save a great deal of money in the future. I have no doubt, Mr. Chairman, in my mind at all but that if this money can be appropriated it will save to the Government and to the people of the country thousands of dollars in the future, and may be the means of saving the lives of many good citizens in the future.

It involves the proposition of a harbor and river improvement at Shawneetown, Ill., with which is connected a levee proposition. Had it not been for the levee proposition connected with the harbor proposition, I have no doubt whatever but what the honorable Committee on Rivers and Harbors would have allowed or reported in this bill the amount which I have requested for this purpose. In all seriousness, gentlemen, it is a question which appeals not only to the locality where Shawneetown is located, but it appeals to the humanity of the people of this country. It has appealed to them heretofore, and this Government has responded liberally, generously to relieve the suffering which has been entailed on account of devastating floods in recent years.

Shawneetown is located in one of the richest valleys in the world, in a high state of agriculture; extensive coal, fluorspar, lead, and zinc mining all yield annually a magnificent commerce both for rail and river. It is the oldest city in the State of Illinois. It was located by the Government of the United States in 1808–9. It is more than a century old. It is the place at which Lafayette was entertained on his memorable visit to America. It is the place where Thomas Posey, aid-de-camp to Washington, and John McLean, first United States Senator from Illinois, are buried. It is the place where nature has made one of the most favorable harbors on the Ohio River, but, unfortunately, recent floods have made the harbor insecure and commerce uncertain during high-water periods. Mr. Chairman, the Government started in systematically to build a levee nearly a century ago to protect this harbor, and did construct a levee there, which is now owned by the Government, and consequently is a Government project. It has already expended about $80,000 for this purpose, the city of Shawneetown has expended $250,000, and the State has expended from $75,000 to $100,000. You see, my people have been industrious and have not depended on Congress entirely for this work only when compelled to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I hope my colleague is not filibustering to prevent the consideration of the tolls bill. It is now about half past 4 o'clock, and we have only read two or three pages of the bill to-day. All the delay comes from the President's friends, and evidently he wants to filibuster to prevent the consideration of the tolls bill.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I assure my colleague that I have no disposition to filibuster on this or any other bill, and I cite him to my past brief services on the floor of this House as evidence of my sincerity. I have never filibustered against a proposition on the floor of this House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I was saying that this is a Government proposition. It is the Government's river; it is the Government's harbor; it is the Government's levee, and the Government is under obligation to keep it in repair, so as to afford a harbor the year round for the benefit of navigation and commerce. A river without a harbor is like a boat without a rudder. This harbor lies in one of the richest coal-mining sections in the world. It is well known that the Ohio River is the greatest coal river in the world.

Mr. Chairman, the floods of 1913 rose above the banks, above the levee, and inundated Shawneetown to the extent that it was completely depopulated, as much so as if the city had sunk below the surface of the earth. The Government sent its boats laden with provisions and supplies of every kind, took the people of the town about 2 miles away to the hills, and tented and fed them in the dead of winter for something like six weeks. Mr. Chairman, it is far better for this Government to expend a little money now to save life and property, so that it will not be required to come, through humanity, through charity, through magnanimity, to the rescue of an unfortunate people, driven from their homes by raging and merciless floods threatening life and property.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. I have heard a great many men here say that the gentleman's amendment had a great deal of merit. Now, the gentleman proposes an expenditure of $100,000 for improving the harbor at Shawneetown. Is that it?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. How can that amount of money be expended there, I would like to ask the gentleman?

Mr. FOWLER. The amount of money can be expended in this way. There is a levee 5 miles long which aids in forming a harbor during high water. The harbor is one of the best on the Ohio River, and for a stretch of 80 miles up and down the Ohio River there is no other place at which a boat can land during high water, making connection with railroad transportation, except at Shawneetown.

Mr. MURDOCK. Shawneetown is one of the first towns established in that part of the country.

Mr. FOWLER. The oldest town in the State.

Mr. MURDOCK. And was selected at first largely because it did have a good harbor.

Mr. FOWLER. Yes; and the Government selected it.

Mr. MURDOCK. Now, what happened to the harbor in the intervening years?

Mr. FOWLER. The things happened there that happen at all other places which are not protected by the hills and mountains, and that is that by the drainage system throughout the country the river has gradually been rising higher from year to year. We have floods which overflow, and as soon as the floods began to overflow Shawneetown and the surrounding territory the Government constructed a levee to protect the harbor and make it accessible. Now, with that levee we have a harbor the year round. Without the levee we have no harbor during high water. The floods of 1913 rose above the levee 2½ feet, drove the entire population in the dead of winter to the hills in tents, and destroyed thousands of dollars' worth of property. My proposition is to raise this levee 3 feet and strengthen it at the base and repair the damages of that flood, so that we may have a harbor there the year round, in high water the same as low water.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, the House recently voted to spend $35,000,000 to build a railroad in the snow and glaciers of Alaska, where there is not anybody to be served by railroads.

We have committed the Government to the expenditure of $60,000,000 for the improvement of the Ohio River to increase its navigability. But this project at Shawneetown, one of the most important points on the river, and where the lives of the people are in jeopardy at every flood time, has had no provision whatever made for it. This is one of the most meritorious projects that has come before the House during this session of Congress. The people of the State of Illinois have spent, from time to time, more than $250,000 of their own money in an effort to prevent this town from being washed away. Shawneetown has the only harbor within 100 miles of that place at which boats can land on the Ohio River, and the reason why the harbor is not available is principally because of the fact that the floods become higher than the levee, and in order to continue the availability of this harbor at this important point on the Ohio River the levee ought to be raised 3 or 4 feet.

That it is a Government project, nobody can deny. If we can afford to spend $35,000,000 to build a railroad in the clouds and snowbanks of Alaska, we can afford to spend $100,000 for the protection of the lives of the people in this vicinity, in the center of the richest territory in America.

One hundred thousand dollars is a bagatelle in a bill like this, or in the expenditures of the Nation for a given year, but $100,000 expended in this locality will be of infinite benefit to the people who live there, and not only save the destruction of vast property values, but will protect the lives of the people who live in this neighborhood. Why, the people of our State are compelled from time to time to send, through the militia of the State, tents in which to house the people who are compelled to flee from the danger that ensues as a result of floods at high water on the Ohio River; but if this $100,000 is appropriated and expended for the protection of this community, that situation will no longer prevail.

This appropriation ought to be made as a matter of right, as a matter of humanity, as a matter of protection to the community in which the expenditure is needed. The people of Shawneetown have been patient for all these many years. They have put up with all the dangers of these floods patiently. They have expended their own money liberally, the State of Illinois has come to their rescue time after time, and the Government itself has recognized the justice of the claims of these people on one or two occasions by spending about $80,000 in the construction and protection of levees that are now there.

All the money that has thus far been expended will have been expended in vain unless this House comes to the rescue of these people at this time and authorizes the expenditure of this additional sum of $100,000 for the increase of the height and width and the strength of this levee to maintain and protect the harbor at this important center of civilization and to protect the property and lives of the people in that neighborhood. And I sincerely hope that the amendment of my colleague [Mr. FOWLER] will prevail.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I shall have to oppose this amendment also. In the first place, there is no estimate coming from the engineers and no project furnished to this House upon which to make an appropriation. If this House were to appropriate $100,000 or any other sum for that work, there is no telling where it would end. There is no statement by any engineer saying that $50,000 or $100,000, or any other sum, would do the work. There is no Government property there, unless we can call the levee that the Government assisted in constructing there many years ago Government property, and, of course, no one will contend that it is Government property, because it belongs either to the State of Illinois or the city, and the Government has never assumed control of it.

Mr. FOWLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Certainly.

Mr. FOWLER. Is it not a fact that the levees in the harbor are Government property?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Not at all.

Mr. FOWLER. I want to ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that the Government has spent $80,000 there?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Oh, I think so; and the gentleman is asking now, as he has a right to ask, $100,000 more, and there is no telling how much it would require in the end.

Mr. FOWLER. If the gentleman will yield further, I want this committee to know that if this $100,000 is appropriated my people will put up the balance of the money to make good that levee for all time to come. They have put up $250,000 and the State has put up about $100,000, and my people have taxed themselves to the constitutional limit and gone beyond that, down into their pockets, and contributed of their own means liberally for the purpose of maintaining this levee.

Mr. SPARKMAN. That may be true; and I say again to the gentleman that I sympathize very deeply with those people. I understand there are something like 1,000 or 1,500 people in Shawneetown, all deserving as much consideration as any others on the river.

Mr. FOWLER. There are more than that; it is a larger town than that.

Mr. SPARKMAN. We had a hearing before our committee, and it was developed, I believe, that the assessed valuation of the property there was about $300,000 in Shawneetown. An engineer was sent there, as was done in the case of Jeffersonville, which we have just been considering, and this engineer reported that an examination of the levee was made by Deputy Inspector Charles E. Hammell, whose report, which is inclosed, indicates, so the district officer says—that the flood of April, 1913, reached a stage of about 2½ feet higher than the top of the levee, causing so much wash on the inside of the north and east sections that the south section was dynamited to prevent further disaster.

Further, that—

An appeal being made to the Illinois rivers and lakes commission, the State of Illinois appropriated the sum of $39,000 for the restoration of the levee to its original proportions. This work is now in progress, and it appears that there will be a surplus of funds left after the repairs are made.

And he goes on to say:

In my opinion the levee at Shawneetown, Ill., does not improve general navigation on the Ohio River, and in view of this, and the further fact that the levee is now being repaired by the State of Illinois, it is not incumbent on the United States to engage in additional work.

If, in the face of that statement——

Mr. FOWLER. I desire to say to the distinguished chairman, that the report does not show any surplus, because all that was appropriated by the State must be used for repair, as the report shows, and it will take at least $200,000 to make the repair that is necessary, and my people will put up the balance if you will give the $100,000.

Mr. SPARKMAN. So, Mr. Chairman, it resolves itself into this, that it is a levee-building proposition for the protection of the property back from the levees, away from the banks of the river, something we have not been doing on the Ohio River, at least, not for many years. It might be cheaper in the end for the Government to assist the people in moving farther back from the river. I see that a gentleman owning a large body of land back of the town for the people to move upon and out of the reach of the floods, if they would accept lots for that purpose. But the people, it seems, would not accept them.

Of course I do not blame them. They said, "No; we do not want to move back, even if the land is given to us." They wanted to remain where they were.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Certainly.

Mr. FOWLER. If that were done, would it help the river and harbor at Shawneetown? If the people were to abandon the place would it help the river and harbor at Shawneetown?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I am not advocating the abandonment of it. I think they ought to stay there, if they desire to do so, and I do not blame them for wanting protection. But what I wanted to call to the attention of the House is——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Florida has expired.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. SPARKMAN. What I wanted to call especially to the attention of the House is the fact that if we once embark upon that policy we shall have to take in the entire Ohio River Valley, at least throughout the flooded district. How much that is I do not know, and no one else seems to know. Certainly no engineer has told us. Now, I am not blaming my friend for trying to help his people; I only wish I could consistently aid him and them. He has certainly labored for them faithfully in this as in other things. But at present I do not see my way clear to aid him.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. A point of order is reserved against this amendment. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin insist upon the point of order?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I will allow the proposition to be submitted on its merits, and will withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I will make the point of order against it if it is not reserved.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is overruled. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] is recognized.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman from Indiana begins, I would like to ask unanimous consent that all debate on the pending paragraph and amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN] asks unanimous consent that all debate on the pending paragraph and amendments thereto close in five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] is recognized.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I desire to support the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER].

First, I desire to say that the gentleman from the State of Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] holds no brief to criticize my course in the Congress of the United States. I am perfectly willing to submit my record against his, not only here, but abroad. I have never opposed on the floor of this House what I regarded as legitimate appropriations, and the gentleman can not show it.

But it might be, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from Washington might feel a little sore because I have been trying to take away from him the $1,200 or $1,400 mileage which he gets from the Congress of the United States. It might be that is what the gentleman speaks to, and that is the reason why he undertakes to lecture me on the floor of this House.

I have never yet, Mr. Chairman, voted against what I regarded as a legitimate appropriation, and I object to the gentleman from Washington, or any other man, forsooth, undertaking to lecture me on the floor of this House.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am for the amendment, because I believe it is a meritorious amendment. I believe it ought to carry. I believe that it ought to obtain.

Millions and millions of dollars have been voted into this bill to improve this little creek or that little creek, carrying two or three thousand tons of commerce, all around the Atlantic seaboard and all around the Gulf of Mexico; and, Mr. Chairman, if the Pacific Ocean, particularly around the district represented by the gentleman from the State of Washington, were looked after, I imagine that he would make the proud boast in his district that he is entitled to come back to Congress, because he is able to get so much of an appropriation for his district.

I think the gentleman from Illinois well hit the keynote. Instead of placing property above human life, I believe the time has come when we ought to place human life now and then above the "almighty dollar." The evidence here is undisputed, coming from the Board of Engineers, that the levee at this place is not high enough to keep the water out, and I do not care upon what ground the appropriation was originally made. If it was made in aid of navigation at one time, the same principle holds good to-day, and this amendment would be in aid of navigation. If, on the other hand, it was never made in aid of navigation, that levee is Government property, and it is the duty of the Government of the United States to maintain it; and if it takes $100,000 to maintain it, and if in the maintenance of the levee or the increasing of its height the people living in that town get an incidental benefit from it, let them have it.

I hope, Mr. Chairman, that this amendment will prevail.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 45, noes 51.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chairman appointed Mr. SPARKMAN and Mr. FOWLER.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 42, noes 57.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Ohio River: Continuing improvement by the construction of locks and dams with a view to securing a navigable depth of 9 feet, $2,000,000: Provided, That the Secretary of War may enter into a contract or contracts for such materials and work as may be necessary to prosecute the said project, to be paid for as appropriations may from time to time be made by law, not to exceed in the aggregate $3,000,000, exclusive of the amounts herein and heretofore appropriated.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. MANN. Can we not have an understanding about the length of debate on this item relating to the Ohio River? There is some desire for debate on it. Can we not reach a limit in advance?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I did not know that there was any desire for debate on it.

Mr. FREAR. I notified the chairman of the committee that I desired some time.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Will 10 minutes be satisfactory?

Mr. FREAR. As far as I am concerned, yes.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I understand that a gentleman on this side wants five minutes.

Mr. FREAR. I want to submit some statistics that will take a few minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Florida submit any request?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I ask unanimous consent that debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto be limited to 10 minutes.

Mr. FREAR. Who gets the 10 minutes?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] has the floor, and the gentleman from Wisconsin wants 10 minutes.

Mr. SPARKMAN. The gentleman from Ohio wishes three minutes and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY]——

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not care for any time. I want to get through with the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the gentleman's request?

Mr. SPARKMAN. That debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto be limited to 15 minutes.

Mr. FREAR. I object, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. SPARKMAN. If I can not procure it by unanimous consent, then I move that debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto be closed in 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida moves that debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in 15 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I do not think I shall occupy all of my five minutes. My distinguished friend from Indiana [Mr. COX] seems to be very much incensed because I have been referring to him as an economist and as a watchdog of the Treasury, and he seeks to reply by referring to the question of mileage. Well, whatever else I may have done in regard to mileage, I have never played the hypocrite about it. I have never stood upon the floor of the House and made a speech condemning mileage and then been the first man at the window to grab what was coming to me. [Laughter.] I have about as much respect for the thief as I have for the man who shares in the plunder. Now, the gentleman seems to be very much enraged, because I asked him if he had heard from the White House. Judging from his actions, he has. I did not want to embarrass the gentleman by asking him what plank in the Democratic platform he favored. He does not need to answer if he does not wish, and he need not answer whether he is going to stand by the platform when he votes on the next bill that comes up here. He does not need to answer these questions. His remarks have suggested them to me, but he need not answer them. I am sorry that the gentleman has been so offended, and hereafter I will not call him the watchdog of the Treasury, for while he stands here on the floor of the House and makes points of order to keep some poor employee from having his salary increased $50, he is very strenuous in his fight when it comes to getting a little money for his own district. Therefore I apologize to him for having called him an economist and a watchdog of the Treasury.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, this proposition is not what appears in the bill, and I presume the Members are familiar with it. The proposition here, of course, is to appropriate only $5,000,000 appearing in this one paragraph. However, the estimate for this improvement is $64,000,000, and it is for the construction of 63 locks. If there is no objection, I would like to insert as a part of my remarks some statistics as to Lock 37, showing the amount of shipments through this canal at the present time. The subject has been under discussion in the general debate, not by myself, but by others, and I offer for that purpose page 2534 and the other page referring to the lock. I ask unanimous consent to make them a part of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin to extend his remarks as indicated?

There was no objection.

The statistics referred to are as follows:

5. Operating and care of Lock and Dam No. 37, Ohio River: This work was placed under the appropriation for operating and care provided by section 4 of the act approved July 5, 1884, as amended and reenacted by section 6 of the river and harbor act approved March 3, 1909, on January 1, 1911.

The dam was raised and lowered five times between August 18 and December 7, 1912, being up a total of 54 days.

During this period 346 lockages were made for the passing of 655 crafts.

The amount expended during the fiscal year was $31,372.86, and the total expenditures, exclusive of outstanding liabilities, amounted to $49,561.90.

Mr. FREAR. It has been shown here, in reference to this project, first, that the total appropriation will need to be $64,000,000. As I understand from the engineers' report, that is the estimate, and I have the page here in regard to it.

I am not acquainted with the exact amount that has been expended up to this time, but I think it is something like $9,000,000 to March, 1913. Most of the traffic on this stream goes down the Ohio River proper. The project here is to expend $63,000,000 in establishing 63 locks, and they are to be used during certain seasons of the year for carrying on additional traffic.

It has been shown as evidence of what the traffic is in this particular lock that 957,781 tons passed through in 1912. That carried all the traffic which went through the Ohio River at that time by means of a lock. Of that, coal amounted to 799,888 tons, leaving a balance of about 137,000 tons, as I remember the figures. They could have shipped the coal by rail, and after deducting the average freight charges of coal, it means $23 a ton average expense to the Government for maintaining the canal. That is the average cost to the Government as shown by this lock.

Mr. Chairman, to my mind it is a grave question whether or not the Government ought to continue a matter of this kind on the strength of the engineer's report, just as has been done on the Trinity River, on the Coosa River, and elsewhere.

For that reason, Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the entire paragraph from line 8 down to and including line 16, page 39.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. FREAR. The purpose of this amendment is in order that more consideration may be given by the engineers to the proposition, and we may learn whether it is going to be beneficial to the country. There is nothing so far presented which shows that this is to be of any great aid toward an increased commerce by the use of these locks, and that is the vital question.

[Mr. ALLEN addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] read some figures that I was unable to follow in detail, evidently undertaking to draw a conclusion from the fact that only a portion of the tonnage of the river went through a given lock. If he knew anything about that river, he would not have made such a statement. The reason why most of the tonnage on the river now does not show as going through a particular lock is because the river is not entirely locked and dammed.

Therefore, in order to get through to the point of destination a great deal of the traffic on the river is held at its origin waiting for a rise and must take advantage of the rise and keep on the crest of it going on down. The actual traffic on the river last year for nine months from April 1 until December 31 was 8,618,396 short tons, and during the same period nearly 4,000,000 passengers were carried.

Mr. FREAR. I have given more than that, according to the engineer's figures.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman has given more than that, it makes all the more remarkable his speech and motion. That tonnage amounts in value to $71,000,000 for nine months of a year, and the gentleman thinks that the Ohio River, a stream 1,000 miles long, is unworthy of improvement! To that state of mind I know of no way of making an appeal. All one can do is to ignore it.

Mr. FREAR. The preceding paragraph makes provision for the improvement of the Ohio River. This is about the canal system.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am talking about the canal system, because it is the only practical system, and anybody who knows that river knows that is true. The gentleman talks about moving freight. I say to him that even with the river closed frequently for months at a time freight moves from Cincinnati to Louisville on the Ohio River on an average faster than it moves by rail, and that you can move freight generally on the Ohio River, with the handicap that now exists, faster than you can do it by rail, because of the rail congestion. I say to him another thing, that any man who knows anything about investment knows that men are not going to put money freely into a business that is subject to be tied up and not earning any revenue a large portion of the year. In my own judgment what will come of the Ohio River and must come when it is a river usable 12 months in the year is physical connection by rail and water, with the carrying on the river of the heavier freight, leaving to the rail the carrying of the more perishable and more valuable freight. You have reached a point in America where you have not railroad facilities sufficient to move the freight of America during ordinarily good times. The Ohio Valley is the great workshop of America. Anything that serves to take from the tremendous strain that is put upon the railroads serving that section and divert some of it to river traffic is well worth the money and the time and the thought of Congress.

This is one of the great streams of the world. In the report of every board that has investigated it its improvement has been recommended in stronger terms than that of the improvement of any other river in America, and the tonnage that is now carried on it is practically equal to the amount of tonnage that at first it is estimated will go through the Panama Canal, and is more than the transcontinental tonnage that goes from one ocean to the other across the continent to-day. Yet the gentleman would have us believe that we are engaged in a wasteful extravagance of money without any investigation. Before either the gentleman or I saw the light of day the importance of the Ohio River and the necessity for its development and its canalization was recognized by men who knew something of the laws that regulate commerce in America. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin to strike out the paragraph.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving harbor at Ontonagon, Mich.: For maintenance, $10,000.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I was very much interested, Mr. Chairman, by the description of the traffic on the Ohio River made by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] who has just spoken; but I wish to say this——

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I shall have to make the point of order that the gentleman is not discussing the pending amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will confine his discussion to the paragraph.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman does not care to give me five minutes on this?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has had three days, and I submit he can extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. FREAR. No; I do not care to do that. I am not familiar with this Ontonagon Harbor in Michigan, which has been read; but heretofore it has been the practice, the unvarying rule of courtesy adopted by this committee, that whenever anyone was discussing a proposition he was not called to order because he digressed from the particular paragraph before the committee. The gentleman himself has a measure amounting to a good many million dollars which is to follow this one almost immediately. We have been given only 10 minutes in this House to listen to a discussion upon a $63,000,000 proposition, the limit being placed by motion. I recognize that it is not a popular thing to call attention to conditions, but it seems to me in all fairness it ought to be done.

If the gentleman insists upon his motion at this time and I have no opportunity to answer the gentleman who preceded me, I shall take my seat at this time. I have only asked for five minutes.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I do not care to be discourteous—not at all—but the gentleman has for several days discussed the Ohio River. This is not the first time he has discussed it, but he has discussed the Ohio River several times.

Mr. FREAR. The gentleman is thinking of some other gentleman. I have not discussed it before at any time. I had no part in the general debate, and we have only reached it in the bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman from Mississippi is out of order.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I was seeking to withdraw my point after having made that statement that the gentleman has had, it occurs to me, ample time to discuss the Ohio River.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I made the point of order that the gentleman from Mississippi is out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois will state his point of order.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman was not discussing the paragraph under consideration.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I was withdrawing my point of order.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, my five minutes has been consumed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. FREAR. How much time have I left on this paragraph?

The CHAIRMAN. Two minutes.

Mr. FREAR. I will take my seat and make the motion on the next paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving harbor at Marquette, Mich.: For maintenance, $2,000.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I trust I may have five minutes on this motion. I desire to say I have not, so far as my recollection goes, discussed at any time the Ohio River. The gentleman from Mississippi is probably thinking of some one else who has done so, and rather successfully, I believe, but it was not myself. The gentleman from Texas took that matter up under general debate. I could not get any time. Now, the statement has been made by the gentleman from Ohio that for 79 days the Ohio River is open for navigation, and I may add that for 54 days it is open for use through the locks. I have shown that only 137,000 tons of coal went through those locks during the period the locks were necessarily used that year. That being so, it indicates that the Ohio River during all these years, for over a half century, has been used without the necessity of these locks excepting for a short period of 54 days.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. FREAR. I will.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman does not mean to make the statement that except for 54 days in the year you can use the Ohio? When the gentleman says that, I desire to say from my personal knowledge, living on it, the gentleman is in error.

Mr. FREAR. If that be true, the engineer report says that is the length of time that Lock 37 was used, and it is the only one used whereby I am enabled to make a comparison, because of the character of the report. The others are bunched together and individual expense can not be ascertained.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman can take any one lock, because the stage of the river is different at different places during a thousand mile length.

Mr. FREAR. That is true, but this is the only lock that can be taken, because that is the only lock which shows the particular expense to be attached to that lock and this lock shows $49,000 for that year.

Mr. SHERLEY rose.

Mr. FREAR. I can not yield to the gentleman in the limited time I have, otherwise I would be glad to do so. It cost the Government at that lock about $23 a ton, and that is a very heavy cost. The Government ought at this particular time to make an investigation to ascertain what is the best method of procedure. Shall we blindly continue this $64,000,000 expenditure on engineers' reports without investigating probable results? It has been stated that we are taking up too much time upon this question. I have heard gentlemen on both sides discuss for an hour at a time questions of comparatively little importance, for the purchase of an automobile or a private pension bill, but here is a question involving $63,000,000, and I would like——

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit, the condition is this, that all the rest of us have investigated and understood this matter for years past except the gentleman.

Mr. FREAR. That answer has been made, and very frequently made, as to a lack of information possessed by those who are inquiring, but here is a fact that can not be gainsaid: For 50 years you never had a lock on the Ohio River and your tonnage is no greater to-day, as shown in the commissioner's report, than it was 16 years ago. That being so, it is a fact worth considering when you are expending $63,000,000. At times the river can not be used on account of the low water. The low water will be there, and you will find it difficult, even with the lockage, unless you have that canal the whole length.

Mr. SHERLEY. That is what we want.

Mr. FREAR. I know that part of the Ohio River not as well as the gentleman from Kentucky, but I have the advice of men of full information on the subject who differ from the engineer's judgment in this expensive proposition.

Mr. SHERLEY. Just one suggestion. You can not judge the value of a single lock when it is only one link in a chain, because the condition of nonnavigability in the parts of a river that are not locked and dammed interferes with the traffic of a whole river.

Mr. FREAR. I admit that statement, but it is true also that not a particle of evidence has been offered by an engineer or anyone on the floor to show that all the traffic has not gone down the Ohio River or through the locks. Now, you have not lost any traffic so far as anything shows in the record, and the traffic is the same to-day as it was 14 years ago. And for that reason, with a large item of expense like this, $5,000,000, it is well to ask what are we going to accomplish? I have no hope that the House will act on my amendment except in a negative way, but I presented the matter and called your attention to it, as I hope I may hereafter when opportunity offers. I think these things ought to be studied, and I am advised that Members of the House, as a rule, have done so. I have been given the judgment of a man who has given much study on this proposition, has navigated the river and is an especially well-informed man. He has been over it frequently and has had much experience, more valuable, I know, than that of the average Government engineer. He is sincere, and has no interest, locally or otherwise, in the question of the improvement of this river.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I wish to insert the following statement as to Lock No. 37:

Total tonnage passing lock	957,781.8
Valuation of tonnage passing lock	$9,513,652.36
Passengers	90,828

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Waterway across Keweenaw Point, Mich.: Continuing improvement by the construction of harbor of refuge at the eastern entrance, $75,000.

Mr. MACDONALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan offers an amendment, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 40, line 18, after the figures "$75,000," strike out the period and after the semicolon insert the following: "for making a cut across Princess Point, $138,000."

Mr. MACDONALD. Mr. Chairman, this appropriation has been recommended by the Board of Engineers, and I think the chairman of the committee will agree that if there had not been, by some misunderstanding, a delay in getting the report to the hands of the committee this item would have been included in the bill. The waterways across Keweenaw Point, as it is well known, are a very important part of the Great Lakes system, and practically all the tonnage on Lake Superior that passes through the system passes through this waterway. The canal is 25 miles long and has a width of about 120 feet, with a mean depth of 25 feet. The cut-off mentioned by the engineer saves a curve with a radius of 185 feet for a quarter of a mile, and is unqualifiedly recommended by the Chief of Engineers, Gen. Kingman, and I ask the chairman of the committee now if he would not consent to allow this item to go into the bill?

Mr. SPARKMAN. No, I will say to my friend, frankly; I can not give consent. I have not had time to read this report. It has just come in, and is dated March 13, this year. It is not the final print, but is what is called a proof print. And I should not like, even if the committee were in session now preparing the bill, to give my consent to the project, not having studied it. I have not had time even to read, let alone considering, it.

Mr. MACDONALD. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee if it had come before the committee in the regular way it would not have been included in the bill?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I can not say that. I have not looked through it.

Mr. MACDONALD. There would have been no doubt that this would have received the same treatment as the other recommendations in regard to the waterway?

Mr. SPARKMAN. It would have been given careful consideration, I will say to my friend.

Mr. MACDONALD. I would like to ask the gentleman if an arrangement could be made to have this amendment passed until to-morrow, and if the chairman would not take the opportunity in the meantime to investigate it?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I do not think I could get the time necessary to study it between now and to-morrow.

Mr. MACDONALD. This is a very important part of the work. The tonnage for this waterway is 2,406,618 tons, 48 per cent of which passes directly through the waterway, while 52 per cent was shipped or delivered from some point on the waterway. Vessels number 1,922.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I want to say to the gentleman that there will be another bill, or should be another bill, passed at the next session of Congress, which will adjourn on the 4th day of next March. By that time there ought to be another bill passed and become a law, and we will then give very careful consideration to this proposition.

Mr. MACDONALD. I hope then, Mr. Chairman, that the committee will adopt this amendment, as the committee can readily see from the circumstances that this is a regular part of the improvements in an important waterway of the Great Lake system that has been plainly left out of the bill through some neglect in getting the recommendation of the engineers in the hands of the committee in time.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MACDONALD. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Was it reported to the full committee?

Mr. MACDONALD. The report should have been before the committee, and I supposed it had been, undoubtedly.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I was wondering whether we did have the opportunity to consider it.

Mr. MACDONALD. The report is dated March 13, 1914.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. We did not have a chance to consider it.

Mr. MACDONALD. And a favorable report is before the committee now.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The Committee on Rivers and Harbors did not have an opportunity to consider it.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MACDONALD. With pleasure.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Is this a report from the Chief of Engineers of the War Department or from the local engineer?

Mr. MACDONALD. It is the report of the Chief of Engineers of the War Department.

I hope, Mr. Chairman, that the committee will pass this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MACDONALD].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. MACDONALD. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 15, noes 58.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving St. Marys River at the falls, Michigan: Continuing improvement by the construction of a fourth lock, $250,000.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the figures "$250,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] moves to strike out "$250,000."

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that we have here now an appropriation for the construction of a lock, and that the situation there is practically the same as that at the Panama Canal. A great deal of commerce passes through this lock, and by the construction of this lock that commerce is given practically a thousand miles of free water transportation. Through that lock there goes a great deal of grain and other products from the Northwest, and from the Pacific Northwest comes our lumber and our grain in direct competition in the markets on the eastern coast with the products that come through this lock. Yet if the Panama Canal act is repealed and the American coastwise vessels are not exempted from the payment of tolls, we will be at a great disadvantage. Taking our lumber as an illustration, it will mean that we shall be compelled to pay on every thousand feet of lumber from $1.47 to $1.56.

That means that much of a handicap that we are going to bear in our competition with those who have the privilege of this free canal. That means that on every thousand feet of lumber that is sent by a transcontinental railway to a competing point on the Atlantic coast from the Pacific coast you will enable them to increase the freight rate to just that extent.

I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that this canal is free, and that the ships that pass through it are principally ships that belong to a trust; and if there ever was any class of vessels that could justly pay the expense of the operation of a canal and of locks it is the vessels that belong to the Steel Trust and those that are controlled by the Anthracite Coal Trust of Pennsylvania. They are special beneficiaries of this lock. Yet we propose to continue to build a lock there and let these vessels pass through free, but the vessels in general traffic that go through the Panama Canal must stop and pay a toll. Why this discrimination? In other words, the people on the Pacific coast are taxed to care for this canal, and yet when we want to get into the same market we must pay tolls to sustain the Panama Canal, through which our commerce must pass.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a copy of a letter I have, showing just what this toll at Panama will mean as applied to lumber. It is a letter that I have received from Mr. G. G. Ames, one of the leading lumbermen in my State, in which he figures out just what the burden will amount to per thousand feet and on American vessels. I withdraw my pro forma motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I asked unanimous consent to extend my remarks by inserting a letter in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Leave has been granted.

Following is the letter referred to:

PUGET MILL CO.,
Seattle, Wash., March 16, 1914.

Hon. W. E. HUMPHREY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. HUMPHREY: It might be interesting for you to know to what extent free tolls may affect the lumber business of this coast in its desire to engage in shipping lumber from Pacific coast ports to Atlantic coast ports of the United States.

The steamship Algoa, built in 1896, has a gross tonnage of 7,575 tons, underdeck tonnage of 7,192 tons, net tonnage of 4,897 tons. The tolls, based on gross tonnage at $1.20 per ton burden, would be $9,090. She has carried a full cargo of lumber under and on deck amounting to 6,012,368 feet board measure. The tolls on this cargo would therefore amount to $1.50 per 1,000 feet board measure.

The steamship Strathendrick, built in 1907, has a gross tonnage of 4,379 tons; underdeck tonnage, 4,072 tons; net tonnage, 2,843 tons. The tolls, at $1.20 per ton on gross tonnage, would amount to $5,254.80. This vessel carries a cargo on and under deck amounting to 3,514,617 feet board measure. The tolls would therefore amount to $1.49 per 1,000 feet board measure.

Out of several steamships which I have figured on, the tolls figured on the above basis vary from $1.47 to $1.56 per 1,000 feet board measure, which, to lumber manufacturers and shippers on this coast, would be a differential in case of free tolls in favor of the American lumber manufacturer and shipper over the British Columbia manufacturer and shipper, and would offset a part of the advantage of the British Columbia manufacturer and shipper, inasmuch as he has the advantage of the American shipper in being able to use tonnage under the registry of all nations of the world. With a sailing ship, steel, ordinary capacity, this advantage to the American shipper would amount to practically $1.33 per 1,000 feet board measure.

There is another thing I would like to be permitted to call to your attention, and that is this: It is reported here on the street on good authority that the United States Government is chartering British steamships to bring coal from Atlantic coast American ports to the navy yard at Bremerton, and possibly to San Francisco and to San Diego for the use of the Navy, at such a price that the British steamship can afford to transport lumber from British Columbia to New York for as low as $4.50 per thousand. In other words, the freight rate paid on the coal by the Navy Department to foreign shipping is based on a probability of their not being able to charter for any cargo off this coast, and the $4.50 per thousand would pay them to load cargo of lumber at a British Columbia port, discharge it in New York, and account for the extra detention for time used in loading and discharging cargo and moving between ports after the discharge of the coal.

I have also heard it reported that the War Department and the Navy Department have, during the past year, sent requisitions for supplies abroad, putting the American merchant in competition with the foreign merchant in tendering bids for supplies for those departments.

The administration certainly has handed the Pacific coast some pretty hard nuts for the Pacific coast business man to crack, and under existing conditions it would not be at all remarkable if the Alaska Railway was built of rails imported from Belgium and if those rails rested on ties from British Columbia.

Yours, respectfully,

G. G. AMES.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Calumet River, Ill. and Ind.: For maintenance, $10,000.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of making an inquiry. The Calumet River is not any part of the Hennepin Canal, is it? I understand it is not.

Mr. MANN. The Calumet River is not any part of the Hennepin Canal, and not very close to it.

Mr. FREAR. I did not suppose it was. In fact, I know it is not. I wish simply to make this brief remark in order to say that the Hennepin Canal in Illinois, which cost the Government $7,401,100, shipped 699 tons of freight in 1907, and the traffic on the canal is now practically all gone. I offer this as a suggestion in regard to the future of the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal, for which we are about to appropriate an equal amount.

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman, for the benefit of himself, however, that the Hennepin Canal, as I have been recently informed, is commencing to do quite a business.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The traffic on the Hennepin Canal doubled in the last year.

Mr. MANN. I do not think the traffic on the Hennepin Canal would have to be very large in order to double itself.

Mr. FREAR. It was only 699 tons in 1907.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Nevertheless it has doubled in the last year.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman from Mississippi yield? Where is the Hennepin Canal? Is it wholly within the State of Minnesota? [Laughter.]

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The Hennepin Canal, I believe, runs from Lake Michigan to the Mississippi River.

Mr. MANN. Oh, the Hennepin Canal does not run from Lake Michigan at all.

Mr. MOORE. For the information of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR], whose items we passed a few moments ago without criticism, can the gentleman tell us where the Calumet River runs into the Hennepin Canal?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. No; I can not tell the gentleman that.

Mr. MOORE. Merely for the sake of the geography?

Mr. MANN. I can tell the gentleman where the Calumet River runs into the Hennepin Canal. The only place where it runs into the Hennepin Canal is in the head of my friend from Philadelphia [Mr. MOORE]. [Laughter.]

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I will say that I have had no opportunity to look up the facts as to the question asked by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], although I have looked up the facts as to the traffic on the Hennepin Canal. Now, if there is anything in Wisconsin——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FREAR. I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can not extend his time by doing that.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to strike out the last two words, and is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MOORE. I do this in view of what the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] said a moment ago about "the gentleman from Pennsylvania." A little while ago we passed, without a word of objection from anyone in the House, a number of items relating to the State of Wisconsin. I mention this because apparently the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR], who has been particularly active, and intelligently so, during the discussion of this bill, has thus far been unable to obtain any reports of the engineers with regard to any of the Wisconsin projects. It seems to me to be a matter of very great regret, and one that ought to have the careful attention of the House, that the Printing Office or some other agency engaged in the distribution of public documents that ought to be available to anybody should prevent the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] from obtaining any information whatever about these projects in his own State. Now, whereas the gentleman from Wisconsin has been able to obtain reports with reference to projects in other States, and has been very generous in his criticisms of projects down the Atlantic coast line, along the Gulf, and up the Mississippi, yet when we strike the State of Wisconsin, where he ought to be thoroughly informed upon these questions, where the reports ought to be at hand, he seems unable to obtain them. Moreover, since the gentleman doubtless makes visitations to various cities in Wisconsin in his numerous campaigns, where he has journeyed along the river banks and streams and over the highways and byways, it seems amazing that he should pass by all those items without commenting upon them for the benefit of this committee. What do we know about these harbors and ports in Wisconsin, as to which this Committee on Rivers and Harbors have inserted these items in this bill?

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, does not the gentleman from Pennsylvania understand that all the projects in Wisconsin are meritorious?

Mr. MOORE. I do.

Mr. SMALL. And not subject to criticism—for instance, the appropriation for Fox River?

Mr. MOORE. Yes, for instance; and take the item pertaining to the improvement of the harbor at Two Rivers, Wis. Why did not the gentleman have some information about this important item when we passed it by? The items in this bill for projects in the State of Texas seem to have been the subject of much criticism at the hands of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR]. Did any gentleman from Texas arise in his place and ask for information concerning the commerce at the harbor of Two Rivers? No. Did the gentleman from Alabama, some of whose projects were criticized a little while ago, rise in his place and ask what kind of a harbor there was at Two Rivers, Wis., and what depth there was when the project was begun? No. Did anyone ask whether they had any commerce there when the first project was commenced in 1871? No. And even the gentleman from Wisconsin, who has been so busy on other projects in the States of other gentlemen, has been unable to obtain a single report about the improvements or projects in his own State. [Laughter.]

I raise the question solely for the information of the House, because if any committee has been at fault in printing the necessary reports that would give the gentleman from Wisconsin sufficient information to review these Wisconsin items, it should go back into the committee rooms and be ashamed of itself. It should not withhold such valuable information from my learned and distinguished friend. [Laughter.]

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph close in 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I want to state frankly that the criticism aimed at me by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] is fair and honest, and I have no objection to answering a proposition of that kind, because it is proper to make and right to answer. It has been the same sort of argument that is always used on this floor to close the mouths of men who have an interest in the bill. I have none. I shall vote against the bill that contains the provisions for Two Rivers and for everything else in the bill, not because all the projects are bad, for some of the projects are good and some of the projects for Wisconsin are good, but the bad in the bill is overwhelming. The harbors of Lake Michigan as a rule are worthy of support by Government appropriation, particularly that of Milwaukee with its 6,000,000 tons of freight, and some other cities on the lake shore where there is a tremendous amount of commerce. The lake commerce of Duluth and Superior is brought to one of the largest harbors in the world.

I admit, from the gentleman's statement, Two Rivers is not entitled to be in this bill, if he has stated the facts correctly. He made a statement as to these facts the other day, so that the House is advised and knows about it. I do not know the facts, but I took it for granted that the House had the information. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] has convinced the House that it is not a fair proposition to go through. For that reason I did not consider it necessary to make objections. But when the item of the Mississippi River is reached, a river which runs through my district, with an appropriation of a million and a half attached to it here, I desire to be heard in opposition, for the reason that practically all navigation has ceased on the upper river except for Government boats and logging, which needs no appropriation. One boat a day, and not always that, goes up and down the river, and that is usually for passengers. The upper river is deserted; the freightage has apparently gone. I am prepared to give some statistics about it when the item is reached in the bill. That is one of the rivers that I know about in that part of the State and that is an appropriation I expect to oppose.

I do think some other appropriations are very desirable for Wisconsin, and I would not oppose any appropriation for Wisconsin where it is for the benefit of any harbor which accommodates reasonable traffic. I would not oppose them for New York or any other large harbor. I do believe, however, as a matter of policy that it would be better for the Government, as a general rule, to demand an equal contribution from the locality to be benefited. If you did that, communities would not be after such large appropriations to be expended on every little creek and rivulet throughout the United States, because the people would realize that the moment they received the appropriation they would have to do as in the road bill, go down in their pockets and make an equal contribution. Now, the principle invoked in one case ought, with rare exceptions, to be invoked in all. As I say, I expect to vote against the bill, although there are good propositions in it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the seven propositions in the bill relating to Wisconsin that have just been read, other than that at Racine, carry the small sum of $78,500. Every one of those items has been recommended by the local engineer, approved by the Board of Engineers, and finally approved by the Secretary of War. There is not one of those items, other than the Fox River proposition, where one cent of money is to be expended for harbor work in the inner harbors, whereas throughout this bill three-quarters of the items that relate to the South, to the East, to the West, to the Mississippi River system, apply to dredging propositions in inner harbors.

I took occasion the other day to point out the inequality and injustice of applying one rule to all portions of the country other than the inner harbors on the Great Lakes. The fact is, Wisconsin has never received any money for the improvement of inner harbors, for dredging and maintenance. If such is the policy of the Government toward other sections of the country, we would like equal treatment with those other sections for the improvement of our inner harbors. The western shore of Lake Michigan has some of the greatest harbors on the Great Lakes. The city of Milwaukee, which I have the honor in part to represent, has a greater tonnage than even the port of Chicago. Yet in this bill we have received no recognition except providing for a survey. We have no provision for the maintenance of this harbor, and yet Chicago has $10,000 for the maintenance of the Chicago River and $10,000 for the maintenance of the Calumet River. I am only pleading for fair treatment for the ports and harbors of Wisconsin on Lake Michigan.

Mr. LOBECK. Is not Chicago on the railroad?

Mr. STAFFORD. Milwaukee has done its full duty toward the improvement of its harbor, and if the other sections of the country are going at this bill with a rapacity unknown in the history of the Government, taking up propositions that have not been recommended by the Board of Engineers, adding to the appropriations millions of dollars which were not originally incorporated in the report of the Board of Engineers, then I say that Wisconsin is not receiving in this bill the consideration to which it is entitled. I hope, following the promise of the chairman of this committee, made on the floor a few days ago, that a new policy will be inaugurated in the future, when Wisconsin will receive a liberal appropriation for the improvement of her harbors.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. SMALL. The gentleman referred to the seven items in this bill for improvements in Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. Other than that at Racine.

Mr. SMALL. And stated they had all been recommended by the district engineer and the Board of Engineers and the Chief of Engineers.

Mr. STAFFORD. Other than that at Racine.

Mr. SMALL. The question I wish to ask the gentleman is whether he has confidence in the recommendation of the engineers regarding these improvements?

Mr. STAFFORD. And the facts are that we do not ask or receive here one cent of appropriation, other than the Fox River appropriation, which you are trying to give back to the State, and rightly so, for one item of improvement other than the improvement of the outer harbor—not one cent for improvement of the inner harbors, and they are the great harbors on the Lakes.

Mr. SMALL. The gentleman has not answered my question. He made a statement that every one of these improvements here had been recommended by the engineers of the United States. I ask here if by reason of that he thought they were entitled to confidence?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I think they are not only entitled to confidence, but I know that as to these items other than the Fox River project they are all worthy; but I am pointing out the inequality, that down in the South you are going ahead and dredging minor creeks, which have no traffic and never will have, and denying the same rule to the dredging of the interior harbors on Lake Michigan, where there is a great amount of traffic.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last four words.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate has been closed on the paragraph, by agreement, and on all amendments thereto. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. MANN. Pending the consideration of that——

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Oh, the gentleman can not do that. He makes the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. MANN. I have made the point of order, and pending that, while the Chair is making the count——

Mr. HARDWICK. But there is nothing in order except to make the count.

Mr. MANN. Very well. I can keep making it as long as there is not a quorum here, and I shall insist on doing so, if the gentleman takes that attitude. He will not gain anything by it.

Mr. HARDWICK. That is all right. The gentleman can not run business in that way. If he wants to make the point of order of no quorum, all right.

Mr. MANN. I have made the point of order of no quorum.

Mr. HARDWICK. Having made the point of order, nothing else is in order until that is determined.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman can not prevent my talking if I want to do so. Even the frightful countenance the gentleman had in his mien just now would not scare me.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the gentleman will pardon me, I like to hear him talk ordinarily, but I did not think the gentleman desired it this way.

Mr. MANN. Why, I was trying to expedite business; only the President's friends are filibustering, and I can not help it.

The committee rose, and the Speaker resumed the chair.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union having under consideration the bill H. R. 13811, the river and harbor appropriation bill, finding itself without a quorum, the Chairman caused the roll to be called, and 249 Members answered to their names, and I present herewith the list of absentees.

The SPEAKER. The Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union reports that that committee, having under consideration the bill H. R. 13811, found itself without a quorum, and under the rules he caused the roll to be called, and 249 Members, a quorum, answered to their names, and he presents the names of absentees to be entered on the Journal. The committee will resume its sitting.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Mississippi River from Head of Passes to the mouth of the Ohio River, including salaries, clerical, office, traveling, and miscellaneous expenses of the Mississippi River Commission: Continuing improvement with a view to securing a permanent channel depth of 9 feet, $7,000,000, which sum shall be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War in accordance with the plans, specifications, and recommendations of the Mississippi River Commission, as approved by the Chief of Engineers, for the general improvement of the river, for the building of levees, and which may be done, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, by hired labor or otherwise, between Head of Passes and Cape Girardeau, Mo., and for surveys, including the survey from Head of Passes to the headwaters of the river, in such manner as in their opinion shall best improve navigation and promote the interests of commerce at all stages of the river: Provided, That of the money hereby appropriated so much as may be necessary shall be expended in the construction of suitable and necessary dredge boats and other devices and appliances and in the maintenance and operation of the same: Provided further, That the watercourses connected with said river and the harbors upon it, now under the control of the Mississippi River Commission and under improvement, may, in the discretion of said commission, upon approval by the Chief of Engineers, receive allotments for improvements now under way or hereafter to be undertaken, to be paid for from the amount herein appropriated.

Mr. RUSSELL, Mr. McKELLAR, and Mr. BARKLEY rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL] is recognized.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Chairman, it is not my custom to consume much of the time of this House, and when I do ask its indulgence it is usually when measures are pending in which the constituency that I represent are interested.

The appropriation provided for in the paragraph just read is of very great importance to a large part of the people that I represent, and a direct benefit to perhaps 20,000 citizens who reside behind the levees along the Mississippi River that in the time of floods stand between them and disaster.

Five of the counties in my district border upon the Mississippi River, and four of those counties, in the recent unprecedented floods of 1912 and 1913, suffered great loss. About 670,000 acres of land were under water for several weeks, from which the levee system at that time was inadequate to furnish protection.

This vast territory is as fertile and productive as can be found in that rich valley, and living within the flooded territory there were about 20,000 intelligent, industrious, and hopeful citizens.

The waterways commission of the State of Missouri, after the flood of 1912, in giving its recapitulation of the loss sustained by reason of the flood in these counties in that year, said:

Loss in land value, $10,000,000; loss in growing crops, $1,800,000; live stock, horses, cattle, and hogs, $100,000; buildings and fences, $200,000; cost of replacing destroyed levees, $100,000; railroads, damage to trackage and roadway, $555,000; total, $13,255,000.

I have no official estimate of the damages done by the flood of 1913, but as it was as high and covered the same territory I presume the damage was not much less.

The loss of property is not all we suffer when such disasters come; the inconvenience and discomfort of the people affected is a matter of serious contemplation; and the distress and suffering of many who are compelled to flee from their homes to save their lives is pitiable in the extreme. Fences, houses, and other improvements and the accumulations of a lifetime are sometimes washed away in a day, and the lives of citizens are frequently destroyed. Privations, hunger, and exposure oftentimes result in sickness and death.

The Government and the Red Cross Society have been good and kind to the sufferers by giving assistance when these disasters have come, for which they have the grateful thanks of the people; but it is better that the money be expended to avoid the necessity for such aid by saving the property, health, and lives of the people than to expend it to partially and temporarily relieve distress resulting from the permanent loss of millions of dollars.

I believe, my constituents believe, and I think a great majority of the thoughtful people of the United States believe that it is the duty of the Government that controls the Mississippi River to protect, if possible, the people along its borders. In my opinion the Government should so regulate and control this river as not to permit it to become an instrument of death and destruction to the people along its banks or to be a constant menace to those living in the lowlands of the Mississippi Valley.

I know that a few contend that levees can and should only be constructed in the interest of navigation, which may sound all right as a theory, but for practical purposes, speaking for myself, I insist that the Federal Government owes a duty to its citizens that live along the banks of the Mississippi River, and can only discharge that duty by giving them adequate protection from the frequent recurring floods from this great national highway that the Government itself owns.

The engineers who are familiar with the Mississippi River from scientific investigations and long practical experience agree in the opinion that the only practical protection from floods will be by constructing and maintaining a complete and permanent levee system, and in their judgment and conclusions I have perfect faith and confidence.

During my service in this House I have always given my active support to appropriations of this kind, and while I favored and would gladly have supported a bill authorizing the expenditure of $12,000,000 a year for five years, as provided in the Ransdell-Humphreys bill for the completion of a perfect levee system from Cape Girardeau south, still as the committee has not agreed to this proposition, I am glad to know that this bill does provide for the expenditure of $7,000,000 in the next fiscal year for the improvement of the river from the mouth of the Ohio to the mouth of the Passes and for levee construction from Cape Girardeau south, which is an increase of a million dollars over the appropriation of last year.

This will greatly extend, enlarge, and strengthen the present levees and add much to the protection of the people, but I hope this will be supplemented by future liberal annual appropriations until a complete system of levees will be constructed that will be a guaranty against future destructive floods.

There are some who say that we ourselves should furnish the necessary protection; and in reply to this will say that four of the counties that I represent have in recent years expended in the construction of levees about a million two hundred thousand dollars raised by local taxation or by bonds secured by the land benefited. This is, as I am informed, about six dollars for every dollar the Government has expended upon these levees. If the floods from which that territory has suffered had been produced wholly by the water from that section, then the suggestion that we should bear the entire expense ourselves might be reasonable; but the fact is that they are produced by the flood waters of the Missouri, the Ohio, and their tributaries that come down to us from 30 States, or more than three-fifths of all the States of the Union. Hence it is a national problem and a national obligation and one that this Government can not or should not attempt to avoid nor fail to discharge.

I am glad to know that the present policy of the Mississippi River Commission that will have the control of the expenditure of this appropriation is now, and will hereafter be, to use more money in revetment work than formerly. This I believe to be one of the important features of river improvement, because of the fact that it furnishes direct protection against loss of property by caving banks, it protects the levees when built, and at the same time protects the channel of the river from being filled up by the caving in of acres of land. Permanent banks insure permanent improvements, better cities, more railways and shipping points, all of which will greatly promote commerce upon the river and in the country.

Mr. Chairman, while the people that I represent were hopeful of even a larger appropriation, still I feel disposed in behalf of my constituents, who are so deeply interested, to express my thanks to the chairman and the members of this committee for this liberal increase over former years. Ten years ago Congress appropriated for this purpose only $2,000,000, or $5,000,000 less than is carried by this bill.

Permit me in behalf of the people that I represent to express the hope that even more liberal appropriations may hereafter be favored, to the end that a complete and a perfect system of levees may be constructed, at as early a date as possible, that will be a perfect protection to all the people in the heretofore flooded districts of the Mississippi Delta. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I object to withdrawing the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the pro forma amendment to strike out the last word.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I have been very much interested in the remarks of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL] who just concluded, and I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that this is the lower part of the Mississippi River, with which, of course, most of the Members are familiar, and that there has been spent upon this branch of the Mississippi River since 1879 the sum of $76,909,505. From 1910 to 1914 there has been spent the sum of $24,730,000. This present appropriation of $7,000,000 is larger than any other appropriation, as was well said by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL], who regrets exceedingly that it is not larger and hopes that it will be larger in the future. At this point let me call the attention of the committee to the fact that you are appropriating $43,000,000 in this bill for general river and harbor purposes, and you have authorized as additional obligations on Congresses which will follow the sum of $33,000,000, or $76,000,000 in all, contained in this bill, which is just about the amount of money that has already been expended on the lower Mississippi River.

In the year 1880 the commerce of St. Louis amounted to 2,130,525 tons. In 1909 it had fallen to 374,093 tons. In other words, it was six times greater in 1880 than in 1909, or there was a net loss of 83 per cent in the commerce during that time.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there has been expended over $100,000,000, as near as I can understand, upon the Mississippi River proper, and of this amount $76,000,000 goes to the expenditures down in the lower part of the river.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman is discussing the most important item in this bill, involving an appropriation of $7,000,000. It is now nearly a quarter to 7 o'clock, and we have been in session since 12 o'clock. Does the gentleman know any reason why the most important item in the bill should be discussed at this hour? Is there any great pressure about it?

Mr. FREAR. Is the gentleman asking that of me?

Mr. MOORE. I am asking the gentleman if he knows whether there is any reason for pressing this matter now?

Mr. FREAR. No; certainly not. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that this is a remarkable spectacle, that the committee in charge of this bill should come in here and ask us to pass this item, involving an expenditure of $7,000,000, under the rules governing five-minute debate. This is the most important item in the bill, and only 10 minutes has been given for its discussion, of which I am given 5.

Mr. MOORE. Yes; and there are still 20 pages remaining to be read.

Mr. FREAR. We have not filibustered or made any attempt to-day, gentlemen. We have tried to help you along. This item, however, is very important. I will submit only a few statistics now, as my time is already about exhausted. I can continue my remarks to-morrow morning, when we again meet.

Mr. MOORE. Can the gentleman tell why we should be crowded in the discussion of this matter to-night?

Mr. EDWARDS. Does the gentleman know any reason why we should not?

Mr. MOORE. Yes; I know a reason. Does the gentleman want me to answer?

Mr. EDWARDS. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. I believe there is pressure from "higher up" to pass another bill.

Mr. EDWARDS. Then the purpose of the gentleman is not so much to delay this particular bill as some other bill?

Mr. MOORE. Not at all; but I think this bill ought to be considered in the regular way. It is a regular appropriation bill, and ought to be given careful consideration, without pressure.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] has the floor.

Mr. FREAR. I understand, Mr. Chairman, that this discussion is not to be taken out of my time.

Mr. MOORE. The river and harbor bill ought to be passed, but it should be considered in an orderly manner.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, if I have not an opportunity to enter into the discussion of the merits of this amendment, as appears certain, I ask that I be allowed to insert at this time pages 295 and 296 from the report entitled "Transportation by water in the United States," showing the shipments on the Mississippi River at St. Louis, which, it seems to me, will be very valuable to those who are interested in this amendment. I ask leave to extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting the extract referred to. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, is my time exhausted?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not.

Mr. FREAR. Then, if my time is not exhausted, I simply appeal to the House in this case. I do not care to try to impress anything more upon the committee except to this extent: This is an exceedingly important proposition, one of the greatest importance in the whole bill. You gentlemen are going before the people with a $76,000,000 proposition, although you have not appropriated it all at this time; but $43,000,000 of it is a direct appropriation, and $33,000,000 of it is to be carried as a burden upon future Congresses. I commend to you the remarks of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY], who to-day told you what you have placed in your party platforms in the past. I have not talked politics, but I tell you this river and harbor bill is one of the most serious propositions you will have to meet; it will come up to plague you in the future; you can not justify your conduct in carrying it through by such methods, in railroading it through in this manner. It seems to me it is unfortunate from every standpoint.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. FREAR. I insert the following extracts as a part of my remarks:

Total 1906 receipts and shipments at St. Louis: Upper Mississippi, 67,140 tons; lower Mississippi, 141,567 tons; Ohio, 100,120 tons; Missouri, 2,485 tons.

The table following shows the decline in river commerce both in shipments and receipts by steamboats and barges. This decline, especially of shipments, may be attributed largely to the diminution of the grain trade. The table also shows the falling off in the receipts of log rafts:

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. What became of the amendment already pending?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. There was one amendment already pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The debate was exhausted on the amendment that was pending. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. What became of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL] to strike out the last word?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL] to strike out the last word.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. McKELLAR. Now, Mr. Chairman, I offer my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "appropriated," in line 11, on page 44, amend by adding the following:

"Provided further, That the sum of $250,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, which shall be expended for leveeing or revetting and otherwise improving the left bank of said river at and near Memphis, Tenn., for the purpose of aiding in preventing an overflow of said city, caused by the building of levees on the opposite side of the river, and for promoting the interests of navigation."

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, it is not often that I trespass upon the time of the committee. I try never to do so unless I have something that I believe ought to commend itself to the House.

The city of Memphis is situated on what used to be called the Chickasaw Bluffs, which are about the highest bluffs on the Mississippi River. All but a small portion of the city in the northern part is still high, and until 1882, when levees were begun to be built on the other side, the limit of high water on the Memphis side was 35 feet. Now, as these levees were built on the other side of the river, the limit of high water on the Memphis side was raised. You gentlemen will probably remember that at one time the Mississippi River used to get to be 40 miles wide at Memphis, but as it was confined to a narrower channel it raised the gauge of the water on the Memphis side. This water gradually encroached on the northern side of the city of Memphis, and this encroachment caused the city of Memphis some 8 or 10 years ago to seek to have levees built on its side. The Mississippi River Commission turned down the request of the city of Memphis, but gave the city a promise of an extreme high-water limit of 41.60 feet. But they continued to build the levees higher and higher, with the result that in 1912 instead of the water going to a limit of 41.60 feet it went to 46½ feet, and absolutely flooded the city. According to the report of the Mississippi River Commission, it caused damage in the city of Memphis in 1912 amounting to $1,200,000, and in 1913 it caused damage in the city of Memphis amounting to over $1,000,000, according to their own reports. Now what is the situation? We appealed to the Mississippi River Commission, and they turned us down. They would hardly even stop at our city; and, as a matter of fact, this commission, that goes up and down the river only once or twice a year, will not even consider the proposition of a loss like this to the greatest and most important city, so far as the commercial river interests are concerned, on that great river.

So much loss has been caused in this way that the city of Memphis has prepared an issue of $1,500,000 of bonds to take care of that water, which she ought not justly to be required to take care of, because that high water has been brought upon the city of Memphis not by any condition of nature, not by any act of her own, but by the building of levees on the other side of that river by the Government and levee districts. We ourselves are putting up the sum of $1,500,000. We are asking only the sum of $250,000 from Congress as an aid to that project, in helping us to protect ourselves. In 1912 and 1913 there were 171 acres of houses under water; houses that when they were built were 10 feet higher than the highest water ever known in Memphis; and it is conceded that this condition is due alone to the building of the levees on the other side of the river, for which condition the city of Memphis should not be required to pay out a cent. As a matter of fact it is putting up $1,500,000 to take care of the water that the Government of the United States and the levee districts of Arkansas and other levee districts along the river have thrown upon us without any fault of our own. We come before Congress asking that only a very small portion of that loss be restored to us.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Chairman, I ask for two minutes more. I am not going to take up the time of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks for two minutes more time. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, will it not be possible to reach an agreement as to the debate on this paragraph?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I should like very much to be able to do so. I made an effort a while ago to reach an agreement, but I understand there are several amendments, some two or three more, similar to the one just offered by the gentleman from Tennessee. I do not know just how much time will be desired.

Mr. McKELLAR. I assure the gentleman that I am not going to take up much time. I have offered a straight proposition, one I think that commends itself, or should commend itself, to the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that his time be extended two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McKELLAR. Now, I am talking about the commerce that is done on that river. There is more done in Memphis than in any other city on the river. For 20 years you have been aiding the levee districts in flood-water times, but never a dollar has gone to Memphis Harbor except in two places. One was where the Frisco Railroad crossed the river and the other was where it reached the other side. For the protection of the property and the life of the people in our city not one dollar, says the river commission, but where a railroad has a transfer you can find it revetted on both sides of the river by this commission for that purpose only.

I do not believe it is fair. I know it is going to be said here, "Why, you ought to have a report from the Mississippi River Commission." But, gentlemen, we can not get the commission to come and look at the conditions. One of them felt injured because the papers published in Memphis some time ago criticized him and the commission because they did not come by and look at the trouble that had been caused.

I am not going to take any more time. I want to appeal to you in fairness to the city of Memphis, in fairness among ourselves, is it not right that this small amount, as compared with the great sum we have got to expend, should be granted? We have taxed ourselves to the limit, 10 per cent of the valuation of our city has been bonded, and is it not a simple act of justice to this city, that otherwise would be saved from any overflow, to give us this small amount? [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I append hereto, as a part of my remarks, (1) a statement relative to the Mississippi River Commission and its dealings with Memphis, Tenn., and (2) a statement concerning Memphis itself—that is to say, a statement showing the kind of city that we have which needs protection:

STATEMENT OF MISSISSIPPI RIVER COMMISSION AND MEMPHIS.

The Mississippi River Commission was established by Congress in 1879, and is composed of three engineers of the Army, one officer of the Geodetic Survey, two outside civil engineers, and one civilian. It is a rare occurrence when any member of the commission is selected from persons living along the banks of the river within the territory under the authority of the commission. There is one member of the board, Maj. West, of Greenville, who comes from this territory. The other members of the commission usually take a trip up and down the river once a year on a special Government steamboat fitted up and kept for that purpose. Since the floods of 1912, the number of these visits has been increased to two. The work of the commission is really done by resident majors, one at Vicksburg, one at Memphis, and one at New Orleans. The commission itself meets at St. Louis, Mo., outside of the territory, sometimes, lately, four or five times a year. The commission has been in existence, attempting to levee the river, for 35 years.

There are various local levee districts on either side of the river within the territory. The work is done by the commission, cooperating with the districts, in a haphazard, irregular way, without definite plan, chart, or compass. The commission makes allotments to the various districts at one of its annual meetings in St. Louis. Naturally, the members of the commission can not have any personal knowledge of the conditions that exist along the river, as they see them only once or twice a year from a steamboat, and as their meetings are never held at any point within the territory.

Some $77,000,000 have already been appropriated by the Government and spent by the commission, and the levee districts along the line have probably spent more than double that sum. Where there are no levee districts, as, for instance, in the State of Tennessee, the commission pays no attention whatever to the river as it affects such localities and appropriates no money for such parts of the river.

A NEW SYSTEM SUGGESTED.

That these levees along the Mississippi River should be built can not be successfully questioned. That building them by means of this nonresident commission is the most expensive, unsatisfactory, and unsuccessful way of building them, likewise can not successfully be questioned. The levees ought to be built like the Panama Canal was built. They ought to be put in the hands of the President, and he ought to be required to select a man to take charge of them and build them, just as Mr. Goethals was selected to build the Panama Canal, and Congress should furnish enough money at one time for such a man to carry out the work not hampered, as the present Mississippi River Commission has probably always been, for lack of sufficient money. The man who builds the levees ought to be required to go to that territory and build them, and the necessary money ought to be furnished him to make a good and complete job of it. We ought to pass a bill similar to the Panama Canal act, by which the President is directed to complete the levees. It is the only way that it will ever be successfully and permanently done. If some definite plan like this was adopted and some effective method of carrying it out fixed upon we could have the levees built, harbors protected, and the people living on and owning lands between the levees, properly looked after and cared for in their rights.

MEMPHIS AND THE COMMISSION.

The destruction of property and the loss, estimated in the millions, in Memphis during the floods of 1912 and 1913 was due to the increased elevation of the flood heights resulting from the confinement of the water by the levee on the opposite side of the river. In 1882, with 52 feet of water on the gauge at Cairo, Ill., and no levees on the Arkansas side of the river, the stage at Memphis was 35 feet, and every part of the city was above the water's reach.

In 1912 Cairo had 54 feet and Memphis 45.2, and in 1913 Cairo had 54.7 feet and Memphis 46.5. This shows an increase in 1913 of 11.5 feet over the stage of 1882, with a proportionate increase in the volume. According to the testimony of Col. C. McD. Townsend before the Rivers and Harbors Committee of the House in December, 1912, the floods of 1882 and of 1912 were approximately the same in volume. Even more convincing and specific evidence in this regard is found in the report of the Mississippi River Commission for 1910, page 2938, which is as follows:

The increased elevation of the flood heights is the result of the general confinement of the flood discharge by the levee system as a whole.

It must be borne in mind also that since 1882 levees have been constructed at Cairo which materially contract the width of the flood, and the "general confinement" at this point may reasonably be assumed to have caused some, if not all, of the increase in the stage of 1912 and 1913 as compared with 1882.

The city of Memphis, which in 1882 was untouched by a stage of 35 feet, in 1897 had 37 feet, with 51.6 at Cairo; in 1903 had 40.1 feet, with 50.6 at Cairo; and in 1907 had 40.3 feet, with 50.4 at Cairo. This gradual encroachment, culminating in the flooding of the northern part of the city in 1912 and 1913, necessitates the expenditure of several millions dollars to protect it from these unnatural flood heights.

Some years ago Memphis, feeling the effects of the encroaching water, crowded upon her by reason of the building of levees upon the other side, asked the Mississippi River Commission for data to guide her in building these levees. Memphis was assured that a levee of 43.61 feet would hold the water. It acted upon these figures, built the levees, and, because of the inaccuracy of the information, the city lost the cost thereof, amounting to more than $300,000. That the Mississippi River Commission was wholly mistaken about it is shown by the results. Mr. C. M. Bryan, city attorney of Memphis, at a hearing before the Rivers and Harbors Committee on this subject last spring, said:

We are preparing to expend $1,587,493.60, and we are asking this committee to give us $250,000. The city of Memphis has never gotten a dollar from the United States Government nor from anyone else. We have already spent $371,329 of our own money. In the flood of 1912 the figures of the Mississippi River Commission themselves show that we suffered a loss of $1,200,000 in the city of Memphis alone, and in the flood of 1913 we suffered a loss nearly as heavy. We built our own levees according to the data given us by the Mississippi River Commission. You will find this statement on page 6. They estimated that the maximum flood stage in Memphis would be 41.6 feet, and a levee of 43.6 feet would hold the water. At a cost of a large sum of money we proceeded, without aid from any source, to prepare a levee to meet all the water the commission said we would be called on to meet. In 1912 the water came along and it came up to the top of our levees and proceeded over the top of them, and we held 45 feet on one side with sacks and other materials, and that was as high as anyone though the water would go. In 1913 it came along and again broke our levees and inflicted on the city a damage of $1,200,000, and that estimate is not our figures, but the estimate of the figures of the Mississippi River Commission.

COMMISSION ACTING WITHOUT CHART OR COMPASS.

The Mississippi River Commission has never made an estimate of the ultimate height to which the levees would have to be built in order to withstand the greatest known floods. Every estimate has been based "provisionally" upon the stage reached by each succeeding flood as the levee system was extended and the flood heights raised thereby.

In 1884 the commission said:

We therefore conclude that the levees, such as have been herein described, are, in connection with an equalization of width and the prevention of caving, an important part of any general and systematic plan for the improvement of navigation and the prevention of destructive floods. (Report of Mississippi River Commission, 1884, p. 32.)

Col. C. B. Comstock, who was then the president of the Mississippi River Commission, commented upon the report of the majority in no weak terms. He said:

I am unable to learn through the report exactly or approximately what heights the levees "such as have been herein described" are to have. (Report of Mississippi River Commission, 1884, p. 33.)

The Mississippi River Commission has never made a statement based upon exact data with regard to the height of levees necessary to hold a flood of the greatest known volume. Every estimate made by it has been erroneous in the extreme and has been based on nothing more nor less than guesswork.

Col. Townsend, the president of the commission, stated the truth of the matter before the House Committee on Rivers and Harbors December 5, 1912, when he was asked by Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi:

Did you figure that $16,000,000 (his estimate before 1912) would put the levees in condition to hold the flood of 1882?

Col. Townsend answered:

No, sir; the estimate was to the provisional grade. The Mississippi River Commission when it adopted the provisional grade did not claim that that was the grade of the flood of 1882, but they were in this position: There was a great deal of discussion as to how high floods would be. Some people thought they would not attain any great height, and the commission took a moderate position, holding to what they called a provisional grade, which would practically satisfy all the disputants on the subject, with the idea that if that grade was not high enough they would alter it in places; but the provisional grade has never been adopted at anything more than a trial grade. (Report of Committee on Rivers and Harbors, 62d Cong., p. 6.)

Yet Col. Townsend, in his address delivered before the National Drainage Congress in St. Louis, on April 11, 1913, and published by the Mississippi River Levee Association as part of its literature stated that—

The height to which levees should be constructed is as susceptible of determination as the strains to be permitted in an office building due to wind pressure or the moving load allowable on a bridge. The city engineer solves a similar problem whenever he constructs a sewer to carry off the storm water from the city streets.

That the commission is groping in the dark and acting largely without accurate information is shown by the varying estimates that have been made by it as to what it would cost to complete the levees.

In 1898 the Senate Committee on Commerce, after an investigation consuming months, reported upon the testimony of Robert S. Taylor, who was until recently a member of the Mississippi River Commission, and upon the testimony of Col. G. L. Gillespie, who was then its president, that—

It is estimated that it would cost to complete the entire levee system, from the head of the St. Francis Basin to the Head of Passes, at a grade sufficiently high and strong to afford complete protection against floods at the highest probable stage, the sum of $18,000,000 to $20,000,000, and it would take from four to five years to complete the system. (Report of Senate Committee on Commerce, 1898, p. 9; testimony of Col. R. S. Taylor, p. 245; testimony of Col. G. L. Gillespie, p. 390.)

Col. Townsend, in December, 1912, stated before the committee on Rivers and Harbors that it would cost $58,000,000 "to build existing levees to the height that we estimated the flood of 1912 should have attained," and that the estimate for revetment work, in addition to the building of the levee, was "about $90,000,000" (p. 23).

Capt. Charles H. West, member of the Mississippi River Commission, before the same committee, said:

You need not expect to get out short of something like $70,000,000 or $75,000,000 ultimately for levee construction. There is another item that was not included in this estimate, and that was the item of loss.

The average loss for the past 25 years has been something over $1,500,000 a year. (Testimony of Mr. West, pp. 26 and 30, Report Rivers and Harbors Committee.)

The estimate for the complete revetment control of the banks from Cairo down was about $158,000,000; slightly under that. (Testimony of Mr. West, p. 30.)

Mr. West testified that the total cost of the revetment and levee work would be $228,000,000, and—

That nearly all estimates that are first put up to Congress, as well as estimates for great private corporations, are away under the ultimate cost; and I think that estimate for a control of the lower Mississippi River is a very modest one, and somebody, either you or the States, will spend that or more before the job is completed (Testimony of Mr. West, pp. 30, 31.)

Mr. Davidson, a member of the Rivers and Harbors Committee, correctly stated the facts pertaining to any appropriation approximating $50,000,000, when he asked Mr. West the following question:

So that, when the Government has started with a proposition of $48,000,000, they have only made a scratch on the surface of this levee system, have they not?

Mr. West replied:

Well, I think those figures ($228,000,000) are about as well as I can give them. (Report Rivers and Horbors Committee, 1912, p. 32.)

Before the flood of 1912 the commission practically considered the work of the Government in the erection of the levees to be complete. In its report for 1911, page 3186, the commission said:

It has been the effort of the commission throughout its history to require from the riparian owners the largest possible self-help as a condition of receiving allotments for the construction and maintenance of levees from the appropriations made by Congress, with a view to the ultimate assumption of the whole burden by them. The time is near by for the realization of that expectation, provided the United States will protect the existing levees from undermining by caving.

In less than a year from the time of this boast there was a disastrous breaking of the levees, and the following result:

The 13 miles of levees that failed in 1912 flooded 10,812 square miles, or about one-half the land behind the entire levee system, as appears from the report of the Mississippi River Commission, 1912, page 3723.

THE KIND OF WORK THE COMMISSION DOES FOR MEMPHIS.

AIDS RAILROADS.

We quote from the report of the commission of 1908, pages 2644 and 2645:

During the high water of 1907 the bank behind the Rock Island Railway incline began to cave away very rapidly, and by the end of the high water a pocket about 875 feet by 200 feet had been eroded. This erosion did not extend below low water over a great portion of the pocket and thus made the repair work very difficult because the water was too shallow to permit satisfactory pocket-mat work, and the wide, flat bank, exposed when the water was at 6 feet on the Memphis gauge, had to be paved with stone. This pocket was completely protected and the high waters of the present season do not seem to have affected it materially.

There are a good many places along this revetment that need repair. These are, practically all of them, just above the low-water line and can only be reached when the river is at a very low stage. It is proposed to repair these during the coming season if the state of water permits.

And, also:

The Rock Island Railway Co. has abandoned its incline in Wolf River and is now operating one on the main bank of the Mississippi, thus removing one of the chief reasons for dredging. No work is contemplated at this point during the coming year.

AIDS PRIVATE CORPORATIONS.

We also quote from the report of the commission for 1913, page 3364, as follows:

Tennessee Chute, Tenn.—(236 L.) Caving has been progressing in this chute for several years, encroaching upon Riverside Park and threatening the plant of the Union Sand & Material Co., located just above the mouth of Nonconnah Creek. During the high water of February, 1913, the railroad spur serving this plant caved into the river, seriously threatening the plant proper. For protection against further inroads of the river authority was obtained to use Government plant for the construction of about 1,000 feet of standard revetment, the Union Sand & Material Co. furnishing the necessary funds. This work is now in progress and nearing completion.

NO AID FOR MEMPHIS, WHERE LOSS IS SHOWN TO BE MORE THAN MILLION.

The commission in 1912 made the following report about Memphis:

The overflow at Memphis was due to the backwater from Mississippi River, which has been at a higher stage here than ever before recorded and has affected the city at three different localities, viz, along Bayou Gayoso, in territory adjacent to Lick and Cypress Creeks, and over the lowland on the right bank of Nonconnah Creek.

The flooded area along Bayou Gayoso is a thickly populated district, in which are situated streets, dwellings, stores, churches, railroads, street car lines, jail, gas plant, manufacturing establishments, and part of the city water-supply plant.

The overflowed district adjacent to Lick and Cypress Creeks is a suburban area not very extensively developed at the present time.

Along the right bank of Nonconnah Creek on the land overflowed is located a considerable number of manufacturing plants of importance and value. These establishments compress cotton, furnish sand and gravel, make furniture, buckets, tool handles, barrel stock, lumber, and other articles of wood, and manufacture mixed feeds, vehicles, structural iron, and cottonseed products.

The Gayoso Bayou district has heretofore been protected by small levees along its banks, but these works were wholly inadequate to withstand the recent flood, although they were enlarged and extended as the high water approached. They were not effective after the Memphis gauge read 40.5 feet, and the final flooded area adjacent to the bayou east of Front Street is estimated by the city authorities at 170 acres.

The character of the pecuniary damages to property in this area is that due to the submergence of dwellings, stores, churches, schools, jail, etc., which was so extensive that the water reached well up into the first story of these buildings; of street-car lines, resulting in loss of revenue; of steam railroads, necessitating the detour of traffic over other tracks; of the city gas plant and the discontinuation of the city gas supply; of the city levee pumping stations; of many industrial manufacturing plants; and of part of the municipal water supply, including its contamination by surface water and sewage.

A detailed estimate of the damage due to the flooded conditions along Bayou Gayoso was made at my request by the city authorities, the items given totaling $1,120,940.

In the flooded district along Lick and Cypress Creeks the city authorities give the submerged area as 65 acres. This land is a sparsely settled resident section, and the damage thereto is small compared with that along Bayou Gayoso.

The area flooded along the right bank of Nonconnah Creek consists of a low, flat strip of land about 3 miles long and one-half mile wide. The numerous manufacturing establishments located here are served by a branch line of the Illinois Central Railroad. Their loss was that due to being flooded to various depths, including damage to plant and stock and to cessation of operations. An estimate of the pecuniary amount of loss involved was made at my request by the president of one of the manufacturing plants affected. It is given as $84,800, the combined value of the plants being stated at upward of $2,000,000 and of the stocks carried by them at possibly double that of the plants. (Report of Mississippi River Commission 1912, pp. 3889–3890.)

AID TO CITIES DISCUSSED AND METHOD OF AMENDMENT APPROVED.

The committee in the House declined to include this appropriation to Memphis on the ground that it interfered with the plans of the commission and that the commission must be supreme. Instead of this interfering with the plans of the commission, it is directly in line with their recommendation, as shown in the following excerpts taken from their report in 1908:

Long ago Congress began making occasional appropriations for works to prevent destructive bank caving along city fronts, and so established precedents for such expenditures. Sometimes these works were provided for by specific appropriations for particular cities and sometimes by provisions in the general appropriation for the improvement of the river directing or permitting the expenditure of specific sums at specific places. Thus, by a course of legislation extending over a long period of years, Congress has unmistakably indicated an intent that the protection of city fronts and harbors should have a place in the general work of improvement of the river to be supported by the Government. The States bordering the river below Cairo have never assumed any part of that burden. In a few instances a city itself has contributed funds toward its own protection, raised sometimes by local taxation and sometimes by private subscription. But as a rule the cost of such works is beyond the means of the city concerned.

The result of all this has been to create a situation of embarrassment to the commission. The citizens along the river have come to think that they can rely on the Government to protect their cities against destruction by the river. When danger threatens they apply to the commission. They are always advised to apply to Congress for a specific appropriation. When they fail in that, or the appropriation proves insufficient and they come back to the commission, a painful dilemma is presented. It has been the practice of the commission in such cases to withhold allotments to the last pinch of necessity. But when that comes allotments are made to the extent of available funds. Some city property has been lost by caving, but no city has been destroyed in whole or in large part. Such allotments have always been approved by the Secretary of War and, indirectly, by Congress, by making further appropriations without forbidding them.

Such a case is presented now in the harbor of New Orleans. A number of specific appropriations have been made for the improvement of that harbor in years gone by, and on several occasions allotments have been made by the commission for that purpose out of the general appropriations, sometimes by express provision in the law and sometimes without it. The situation in that city has been a critical one for a number of years. As the concentration of the river's flow within its channel has progressed from year to year by the extension of the levee system, the volume of water flowing in the channel past the city has necessarily increased. The resulting scour has steepened the subaqueous slope of the banks to such a degree that they tend to slip and slide into the river. Several such slips have occurred and others are to be apprehended. Last year the city of New Orleans undertook a great program of improvement along the river front, with a view of increasing the security of the city's protection against overflow and preparing the way for a large extension of dock room. This is in anticipation of an increase of trade generally, and particularly with the Orient. While this work was in progress an extensive slip took place in the bank. The commission visited the ground and examined the situation personally. As in former cases, the citizens were advised to make an effort to secure a special appropriation for their harbor. There would be a propriety in such an appropriation beyond that existing in the case of any other city on the river. New Orleans is not merely a river town like Memphis or Natchez, but is also a seaport in as literal a sense as Boston or New York.

But the effort to obtain a special appropriation failed, and the commission felt impelled, therefore, to allot out of the appropriation made by the act of May 27, 1908, the sum of $150,000 to New Orleans Harbor. A somewhat similar although not so urgent a situation exists at Natchez, and an allotment of $100,000 was made out of the appropriation for last year for work at that place. There has been an apparent disinclination on the part of Congress in recent years to make specific appropriations for particular places on the Mississippi, for which there are many manifest and strong reasons, and it seems probable that they will not be made as freely in the future as they have been in the past, if at all. (Part 3, Report of Mississippi River Commission, p. 2656–2657.)

This report as to cities is further confirmed by a report of the Mississippi River Commission for 1913.

The position of the commission in regard to allotments for work for this purpose was fully stated in its annual report for 1908. During the year allotment was made for work at Helena, Ark. as specifically provided for in the river and harbor act approved March 4, 1913, and at other places where the necessity was most urgent. (Report of Mississippi River Commission, 1913, p. 3385.)

In 1912 the commission made a specific appropriation for an Arkansas levee, and several special appropriations like the one asked for by Memphis have been made for Cairo, Ill. Last year, 1913, an identical provision was made for Helena, Ark., except the appropriation was $100,000. Thus we see that if the commission has a policy, which is exceedingly doubtful, the appropriation provided for in this amendment is directly in line with such policy. If it has no policy at all, then this amendment is directly in line with the precedents already established by Congress for other places.

In addition to that, in this very bill a special appropriation of $125,000 is allotted to the city of Vicksburg. This was done by an amendment just like the one here presented.

The amendment passed by Congress for Helena last year is as follows:

Provided, That of the amount herein appropriated, $100,000, or such sum as may be necessary, shall be expended for revetting and otherwise improving the right bank of said river at or near Helena, Ark., for the purpose of preventing a breach in the levee by the caving of the bank at that point, and for promoting the interest of navigation.

In considering this bill in the House on March 24, 1914, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 5733, the House adopted the Collier amendment of like kind for Vicksburg. The Collier amendment is as follows:

Amend, page 29, between lines 20 and 21, by adding a new paragraph, as follows:

"Improving harbor at Vicksburg, Miss., in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 667, Sixty-third Congress, second session, and subject to the conditions therein stated, $125,000."

Late at night of the same day, as shown on page 5762 of the RECORD, when few were voting, the House voted down the McKellar amendment for like work at Memphis. The Memphis amendment is as follows:

After the word "appropriated," in line 11, on page 44, amend by adding the following:

"Provided further, That the sum of $250,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, which shall be expended for leveeing or revetting and otherwise improving the left bank of said river at and near Memphis, Tenn., for the purpose of aiding in preventing an overflow of said city, caused by the building of levees on the opposite side of the river, and for promoting the interests of navigation."

It will thus be seen that New Orleans and Natchez have been taken care of by the Mississippi River Commission, and Congress has taken care of Helena, Cairo, and Vicksburg, but Memphis is left out in the cold, except that the commission has allotted a few dollars to take care of a railroad crossing and a gravel company's plant at Memphis.

MEMPHIS.

Memphis has 131,000 people, according to the census of 1910, and has more than 150,000 people now.

It is the largest cotton market in the world except Liverpool. It is the largest hardwood lumber market in the world.

It is the largest manufacturer of cottonseed products in the world. It has 17 railroads coming into it.

It has the largest river commerce of any city on the Mississippi River.

Until the building of levees on the other side of the river no part of the city was subject to overflow.

The raising of the water has caused millions of loss to the city. The waters of 27 States have been turned on it.

Because it believes that those in the valley should be protected, it is in favor of the levees, but it submits that a small portion of the expense of protection from these overflow waters coming from 27 States should be borne by the Government. Is it not a fair proposition?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, this is a project for which there is no survey or estimate furnished us by the engineers. Not having one, it is impossible for us to tell how much the proposition would finally cost the Government.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes; for a question.

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to explain to the gentleman that the survey was ordered at the last Congress, but nothing has ever been done with it.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Well, the gentleman must wait until the survey comes in.

Mr. McKELLAR. Our city would be washed away by that time. We have been flooded twice since we asked for the survey. We have got to act now, for the flood comes annually since the levees have been built, and Memphis, as I say, has bonded itself for a million and a half dollars.

Mr. SPARKMAN. According to the gentleman's own statement, there is no survey here. There is one pending, it seems, but it has not been reported upon. But, in addition to that, the Mississippi River Commission can take care of the banks of the river at any point where there is any danger. We appropriate money enough for them. Why should we be called upon, after furnishing the large sum of money we are appropriating in this bill, to furnish specific sums for any particular part of the river?

Mr. McKELLAR. May I ask the gentleman if he would be willing to let it come out of the amount appropriated?

Mr. SPARKMAN. We have been fighting against that for some time, and I should not like to return to that policy even to accommodate, as I would otherwise like to do, my good friend from Tennessee.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MCKELLAR) there were 21 ayes and 45 noes.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee demands tellers.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Chairman, what was the vote? I did not catch it.

The CHAIRMAN. The yeas were 21 and the nays were 45.

Mr. McKELLAR. I withdraw the demand for tellers.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I have two amendments which I desire to offer, but they apply to different points. They are similar amendments, and, if agreeable, I will offer both together to save time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that it will hardly save time. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 44, line 11, after the word "appropriated" insert a new paragraph as follows:

"For improving the harbor and strengthening the levee at Hickman, Ky., $50,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War."

[Mr. BARKLEY addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the other amendment which I have sent to the desk may be also read at this time, and that I may without interruption be permitted to proceed for five minutes to discuss that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that his time may be extended for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman also requests that the second amendment may be reported for information. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 44, line 11, after the word "appropriated," insert a new paragraph, as follows:

"For improving the harbor and strengthening the levee at Columbus, Ky., $25,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War."

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I am not going to object to this, because I know the gentleman is interested in it, but we are here trying to get through this bill, and after we pass this item I am going to object to any extension of time.

[Mr. BARKLEY addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, these two amendments are on all fours with the one we voted upon a few moments ago regarding Memphis. There has been no recommendation or a survey by the engineers for this work, and unless, as I have said more than once to-day, we are going to depart from the rule on which we frame these river and harbor bills we can not afford to adopt this amendment.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. I will state the same condition exists at these places that exists in the case of Memphis. We have asked the Mississippi River Commission to go there and investigate the conditions, but they have not gone to look into these conditions.

Mr. SPARKMAN. We have, at the request of the people along the Mississippi River, created the Mississippi River Commission to do this work, and we have placed and are placing large sums of money into their hands to make improvements as they may see proper, and at such places as they may deem best. In fact, we have given them power, in connection with the Chief of Engineers, to do practically as they please, the only limitation being that the work must be done in the interest of navigation.

I suppose that if and whenever they find it is important, they will do this work. In the meantime I, for one, shall oppose appropriating separate sums of money for any of these places. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BARKLEY. I ask for a division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 21, noes 44.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. What does the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] want done with the second amendment.

Mr. BARKLEY. I want it adopted. [Laughter.]
The CHAIRMAN. It is not before the committee.
Mr. BARKLEY. Then I offer the amendment.
The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.
The Clerk read as follows:

Page 44, line 11, after the word "appropriated," insert a new paragraph, as follows:
"For improving the harbor and strengthening the levee at Columbus, Ky., $25,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.
The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.
Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.
The committee divided; and there were—ayes 15, noes 36.
So the amendment was rejected.
Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.
The Clerk read as follows:

Between lines 11 and 12, on page 44, add a new paragraph, as follows:
"Improving Natchez Harbor, Miss., $75,000, under the supervision of the Secretary of War."

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, this harbor has been recognized by Congress. One hundred and fifty thousand dollars was appropriated, I think, in 1911, but only one-half of the amount spent. The revetment work at the harbor, where it was completed up to about one-half of the crescent in the harbor, is perfectly solid where that work was done, but the portion below, where the work was left off, is caved in and is now in danger of undermining the city water plant. It has caved to such an extent that vessels can not land in safety. I want to say that this condition is caused by the levee constructed on the opposite side of the river. They built what I term a big "bull tongue," that throws the water across the Mississippi River, about 1 mile nearly at this place, and the current coming back into the banks of the harbor at Natchez is caving in the banks. Hence the Government work itself is directly responsible for the great danger of inundation of this harbor. This was a great harbor by nature. Even the great battleships go up the Mississippi River and land in this harbor. It is a harbor that, if it had not been for the dangers caused by the construction of this "bull tongue" at Giles Bend, would be in a natural state and a perfect harbor to-day. We do not ask for the whole hog. I just ask for half a hog. I believe it would take $150,000 to do this work, and I ask for only $75,000. I do not come before you, gentlemen, as hoggish, but I come for what is right. The citizens of Natchez have expended more than $200,000 of their own money to protect this harbor, and I ask Congress to make this direct appropriation, because it seems the Mississippi River Commission does not feel like spending the money unless specifically directed by Congress. I want to say this, that the Mississippi River Commission last July made the soundings and said that this harbor needed the work, but that the funds were not available. How will they be available unless Congress points it out specifically to the Mississippi River Commission to put $75,000 into Natchez Harbor?

I want to stand by this bill, and I am going to do it regardless of whether this amendment is adopted or not. And I want to say that the Mississippi levee system does not benefit me, but damages me. The levees are in Louisiana, across the river from my district. They raise the flood tide and put the water over on my people. But I am not complaining about that at this time. I am asking that simple justice be done to this harbor, which has been damaged, and not only damaged itself, but caused damage to property there of something like $350,000 in the waterworks system and the sawmill down there. They are in danger right now because of the water current being turned around by the Giles Bend bank. I ask you, gentlemen, not to vote this down, for I know my proposition has merit in it.

I would not present a proposition to this House simply because it happened to be in my district if it did not have merit. I will not vote for any proposition anywhere, even in my home town, if it does not have merit, and I ask you gentlemen to let this amendment go in, because it is a matter of necessity to my district. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. ADAMSON). The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. QUIN. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 15, noes 34.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the Mississippi River improvements.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Any funds which are herein, or may hereafter be, appropriated by Congress for improving the Mississippi River between Head of Passes and the mouth of the Ohio River, and which may be allotted to levees, may be expended, under the direction of the Secretary of War, in accordance with the plans, specifications, and recommendations of the Mississippi River Commission, as approved by the Chief of Engineers, for levees upon any part of said river between Head of Passes and Rock Island, Ill., in such manner as, in their opinion, shall best improve navigation and promote the interest of commerce at all stages of the river.

Mr. MORGAN of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, when the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER] offered an amendment this afternoon to the rivers and harbors bill for the improvement of the harbor at Vicksburg, Miss., which carries an appropriation of $125,000, certain gentlemen seized upon this opportunity to criticize those who avail themselves of the right to advocate the improvement of the Mississippi.

Now, I would remind these gentlemen that the control and improvement of this river is a subject of great importance to most of the States of the Union, and therefore they unquestionably know, or at least ought to know, that it should be brought within the scope of national supervision.

The platforms of the great political parties have already declared it to be a national problem. If for no other reason than the fact that it plows through a number of States, and the expense of its maintenance within bounds is too great a burden to be borne alone by those States most subject to its ravages, should make it a subject for national supervision.

Now, I am not visionary enough to imagine that we are exempt from the faults and infirmities of common humanity. I know we all have our limitations. Yet, in my judgment, this is a matter which rises far above the sphere of partisanship and appeals to the sound judgment and patriotism of every fair-minded American. I am not inclined to believe that we are going to permit the mist of sectionalism to rise in our minds to pervert our senses of proportion, for by the grace of heaven we have stricken it from our vocabulary. The Members of this House, therefore, will not consume their time and energy in speculating as to whether one section of our common country will secure a little more benefit than another.

Is it essential to the justice of a proposition or bill that it should benefit every part and parcel of the country alike? If so, no appropriation measure could ever pass the House. If a considerable portion of the country profits by a measure, that is all that is and can be required. The improvement of the Mississippi concerns the prosperity and happiness of millions of Americans; therefore this should be sufficient justification for its improvement. [Applause.]

It is universally conceded that the primary function of a legislator, as inculcated to-day, is to legislate for the benefit of the Nation. This broad policy we must jealously adhere to in the administration of its affairs if we expect to continue to forge to the front.

Is it not admitted that the first fundamental national duty is the construction and maintenance of an efficient internal waterways system? Yes; and the first essential improvement of our waterways should be the control of the waters in such a way as to minimize, if not effectually prevent, disastrous floods, and our waterways system will never attain its maximum usefulness until that time arrives.

Lieut. Col. Suter said that he "considered that the improvement of the stream for navigable purposes without it is impossible." In verification of this conclusion he, in part, said:

I think you have got to retain control over the whole volume of water. The discharge which passes within the banks is less than half of the flood discharge of the river, and the low-water discharge is only about one-tenth of that which passes within the banks, about one-twentieth of the total discharge, and any work that you can put in to control the low-water flow on a stream like the Mississippi are liable to be utterly destroyed and rendered nugatory by this vastly larger volume of water which passes down the river during flood stages. At this season of the year the cut-offs occur, which will upset any plan of improvement, because they change entirely the regimen of the river, its course, its slopes, and everything about it.

I take it that no one in these enlightened days is so superficial as to contend on the floor of this House that the improvement of the Mississippi River is a local improvement, benefiting only a few. The magnitude of this great work of nature in itself is refutation ample and sufficient. This great stream and its tributaries, as we all know, intersects and joins the great productive center of the country, hence affecting directly the welfare of a vast portion of this continent.

Contiguous to the Mississippi River lies the most fertile valley, I venture to say, known to the human race. In this plane we grow corn, cane, rice, cotton, and, as a matter of fact, the fertility of the Mississippi Delta is so extraordinary that we can produce every product known to agricultural science. [Applause.]

This tract of land embraces approximately 20,000,000 acres of soil of unprecedented productivity, and the expenditure of only a few million dollars by the Federal Government will render it immune from floods. The authority of the Government to do this is beyond doubt or cavil—it is elementary. But the question naturally arises, Will the Government be justified in making an appropriation for such a purpose? Now, aside from every other consideration, would not the protection of this valley from disastrous floods increase the valuation of the Nation's assets, and thus enormously add to its taxable wealth? This, of course, I take it no one is prepared to gainsay.

Does it behoove any Member to contend that this great food-yielding entity, with its diversified soil and different climates, means nothing to the Government? Will you assert that this great highway of commerce, connecting the different regions mutually dependent one upon the other for their prosperity and development, one contributing toward the industrial and commercial growth of the other, is of little consequence to the General Government? Our cotton, lumber, and other products are necessary to the continued prosperity of your section. On the other hand, your wheat, hay, and other commodities are essential and necessary to the welfare of ours. Therefore, in appealing to the Congress to assist us in the protection of 20,000,000 acres of land from overflow, I am sensible of the fact that we are asking the Government for the performance of a function which rightfully and legally belongs to it, and which it should not even attempt to shirk. [Applause.]

The preservation and improvement of this river, as all of us unquestionably know, will not be for the benefit of those alone who abide along its borders nor for the mere protection of the people against floods, for this historic stream, directly or indirectly, in its various ramifications affects the well-being and prosperity of the people of the whole Nation, irrespective of their place of abode.

The Mississippi River is under the complete control and domination of the Government; it is a public highway, made so by a specific declaration—a navigable stream over which no other power under the high heavens has the slightest semblance of authority. If this be true, it is the inherent duty of the Government to improve its navigation and confine its waters within bounds by the institution of an efficient levee system, or some other system, if you will; but for heaven's sake remove this horrible and ever-impending menace to those who dwell behind its banks. When you protect this area from floods you at the same time promote the industrial and commercial activities of the country and also add a valuable tract to the national domain, and I think we are all prepared to concede at this time that our cultivable lands are decreasing while our population is rapidly increasing. Moreover, will not the agricultural products of this immense tract of land, when it once becomes immune from floods, immensely increase the general wealth of the Nation? For these reasons the improvement of the Mississippi River should commend itself to the membership of this House, and I am not inclined to believe that any statesman who has any regard for his political reputation will contend that he is indifferent to these great benefits.

Our lands have been frequently inundated, our plantations and buildings destroyed, our mules, cattle, and other live stock swept away upon the breast of this mighty stream, and the people rendered literally homeless by the surplus waters of 30 other States. Now, in order that we may use, enjoy, and improve our lands at our own expense we invoke the aid of the only responsible entity on earth, the Federal Government itself, whose niggardly policy alone is directly responsible for such misery and ruin.

Now, I sincerely hope it will not be argued that nature created this drain to carry off the surplus waters of a number of other States and for that reason we are not entitled to any relief at the hands of the General Government.

No one will take issue with me, I venture to say, when I assert that it is one of the prime functions of the Federal Government to foster and encourage the growth and development of its resources. Is it not, furthermore, the duty of the Government to quarantine whenever it becomes necessary in order to protect its citizens from the ravages of diseases, and also to protect them from the encroachment of enemies? If this be true, does not it follow that it is equally the Government's duty to protect its citizens from the ravages of the elements, from the devastation of floods and the attendant loss of life and property? Do you believe that 6 sovereign States of this Nation should be from time to time converted into a veritable lagoon to absorb and receive the surplus waters of 25 other States because of the parsimonious policy adopted by the General Government? Are you not conscious of the fact that these destructive floods leave desolation, ruin, and death in their wake? And yet you are perfectly willing that the Government, in whose hands the power and ability alone abides to prevent their recurrence, should stand serenely by and offer us, grudgingly, from time to time a few paltry dollars. This can only be characterized, in my judgment, as a national crime. [Applause.]

Now, it is argued that those who are especially benefited by the proposed improvements should bear the burden thereof. Now, is it patriotic to assert that 6 States and the inhabitants thereof should be blotted from the face of the map of the greatest Nation of the world in order to drain and carry off the surplus water of 25 other States? Will you make this statement and call it patriotism? If you do, in my judgment, your patriotism is painfully in need of expansion. I am utterly at a loss to understand how any unprejudiced mind can advance or countenance any such proposition. It is contrary to every principle of justice and fair play.

The Government constructs in various States fabulously expensive post-office buildings. Now, who are the special beneficiaries of these buildings? Naturally those who happen to possess property adjacent thereto, but in fact and in reality all of the people living within the confines of the respective cities are more or less benefited; all save the rural population, and I can safely that it is not in the remotest degree benefited thereby. However, is this a logical reason why the Government should discontinue to construct and maintain public buildings? I am satisfied that those of you who represent and speak for rural districts do not subscribe to such a doctrine. Heaven forbid that I should ever become an apostle of such a narrow and short-sighted policy, and I predict that if this Government ever supports or stands for such a provincial policy it will soon find itself rich alone in memories. I unqualifiedly subscribe to all measures adapted to the needs and circumstances of the people.

As I stated a moment ago, untold millions are annually consumed in the erection of public buildings throughout the country, toward the construction of which the rural population largely contributes in the shape of taxation; but the very moment there is an effort to improve a navigable stream, which improvement not only means much to the rural population, but, moreover, adds millions to the commerce of the Nation, we, with wonderful unanimity, throw up our hands in holy horror and protest that it is criminal extravagance pure and simple. "There are two things to which we never grow accustomed—the ravages of time and the injustice of our fellow men."

But, as I have said, the improvement of this river is not for the special benefit and privilege of a few. Practically all sections of our common country have a common interest in this great highway which blankets the map of the United States. I think that out of the 48 States of this glorious continent at least 31 are beneficially affected by its improvement. I contend, also, that its improvement is of paramount importance to the producer and the consumer, and this I am going to endeavor to show in the course of a few disconnected observations.

Aside from the benefits which I have endeavored to describe and point out, the care of this river protects the States upon its borders, north and south, from the complete control of the railroads. We are carrying to-day, I think, approximately one-twelfth of our commerce by water in spite of the fact that water transportation is about one-fifth of land transportation. Is it because the railroads handle freight with more expedition? No; but for the reason that our waterways system is inadequate and inefficient, and this great disparity of rates between water and land has, in my judgment, materially retarded the industrial and commercial growth of the country. It is notoriously known that an adequate water system imports cheap rates, and cheap freight rates necessarily mean an increase in agricultural productions, and agricultural productions signify national prosperity.

For years it has been argued that agricultural production is regulated chiefly by the cost of transportation and not by the cost of production, and this contention is as true as it is old. We have learned that anything which enables us to handle our products economically has an economic effect on agricultural production.

I can not believe that there is on the floor of the House a single Member who is oblivious to the benefits which will accrue inevitably to the Nation through such a system. Why, it is imperative to the growing exigencies of the Nation, and none of us are unmindful of the change that has taken place in the past few years with reference to this matter. We are fully aware that there is an everincreasing sentiment in favor of the development of waterways, and during the past few years no public man of any moment has been so impolitic or indiscreet as to even disregard this all-important subject, realizing that the people have concluded that it directly affects the internal and foreign commerce of the country, and therefore the prosperity and welfare of the people. Hon. O. P. Austin, Chief of the Bureau of Statistics in the Department of Commerce and Labor, in 1911 said, in part, before the Deeper Waterways Association, at Chicago:

I therefore close with the assertion with which I began this discussion—the Mississippi Valley can not attain complete commercial success without the Panama Canal and the Panama Canal can not attain complete commercial success without the Mississippi Valley, reenforced by deeper waterways from the Lakes to the Gulf.

Now, the success of all nations unquestionably depends, to a certain extent at least, on the economy of transportation. Our people, appreciating this fact, are now asking and insisting upon the development of our water transportation facilities, which is the cheapest transportation agency known to the world. Hence, it is up to the General Government to bring its inland waterways system up to a standard of efficiency and there maintain it, in order to enable our largest vessels to ply up and down the great avenues of commerce unimpeded and uninterrupted by any tide or during any season.

It is not necessary that one should give years of study and thought to this great question to know that upon the depth of the channels depends the carrying capacity of the vessels. Naturally, the greater the carrying capacity of the boats the cheaper the cost of transportation.

I believe that any improvement which reduces the cost of conveyance will logically lessen the tax we pay to the railroads in the shape of excessive freight rates. For these reasons I believe that this is a question whose importance to the people can not be adequately estimated.

It is also urged that the commercial and industrial growth of the country has exceeded the growth of the railroad facilities for carrying the same. I know this proved to be a sad fact in my own State during the last cane-grinding season. Therefore an efficient waterway system will not only reduce the cost of transportation by its competitive rates but at the same time spare us this ever-recurring railway congestion.

Congress, in my judgment, may erect a tariff wall of any size or description that human ingenuity may devise or establish for the commercial activities of this country—a veritable free-trade basis—yet it will fail to bring about a reduction in the cost of living until it undertakes to cheapen the cost of transportation.

Now, I am not antagonistic to the railroads, and far be it from me to disparage their works. They have, indeed, done much toward the material development of this continent—much more than the demagogue is likely to concede. However, I am not one of those who believe that the transportation business is the exclusive province and function of the railroads. They have spent untold millions in the construction of a magnificent network of railroads throughout the length and breadth of this country, but the burden has been with superb precision shifted to the backs of the people in the shape of excessive freight rates. In the last analysis, the people pay the toll. Therefore the development of our waterways is a sound economic policy for this Government to adopt.

The following, which is an extract taken from Mr. AUSTIN'S address delivered at Chicago, is indicative of the great disparity between water and land transportation:

And while I need not impress upon you gentlemen the importance of substituting water transportation for that by land, your views in this direction will perhaps be strengthened when I tell you that the charge for transporting wheat by rail from Chicago to New York, a distance of 1,000 miles, has averaged during the last decade a little over 10 cents per bushel, while the average rate per bushel during the same period for the same wheat passing from New York to Liverpool, a distance of 3,000 miles, was 3 cents per bushel. Ten cents per bushel for 1,000 miles by rail; 1 cent per bushel for 1,000 miles by ocean steamer; and that, too, the annual average during the 10-year period, 1900–1910.

The following statement, made by Mr. Stuyvesant Fish, president of the Illinois Central and Yazoo & Mississippi Valley Railroads, before the Commerce Committee, conclusively shows what a salutary effect the mere existence of the Mississippi River has on freight rates:

The rivers, and especially the Mississippi River, control rates, and will continue to do so, even though the steamboat traffic shall not be renewed.

The following statement, made by Charles A. Pillsbury, the great flour-mill man of Minneapolis, before the Nelson committee, also shows what a wholesome influence the presence of the Mississippi River has upon railroad rates:

We consider the presence of the Mississippi River and the fact that it is kept in a navigable condition the great regulator of the railroad rates; that the benefits should not be measured by the tonnage as much as by the possibility of sending the freight by water.

Another matter which merits our sober thought and careful consideration is the reclamation of our arid and semiarid, swamp, and overflowed lands. The hygienic value of such work will be a great blessing to the people aside from the immense value of the tracts of land which it will bring to the national domain. [Applause.]

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, the question of the improvement of the Mississippi River must be viewed from several angles:

First. Should it be improved in the interest of interstate commerce in the discharge of the burden put upon the Federal Government by that clause of the Constitution, which says:

Congress shall have power to regulate commerce among the several States.

Even then the term "commerce" must be resolved into its elements, which are twofold, for it embraces as the court has declared, both "navigation" and "intercourse."

Second. Should the Federal Government undertake to protect the alluvial valley from overflows? This question also is divisible. First, are the disasters annually caused by the destruction of life and property of such proportions as to impose an obligation on the Federal Government? Second, is the territory which can be made habitable capable of furnishing homes and employment to enough citizens, and are the possibilities of industrial development great enough to justify the expectation and satisfy the judgment of Congress that its reclamation will promote the general welfare?

Third. If these are answered in the affirmative, either in whole or in part, the question next to be determined is, What is the most feasible method by which the desired result can be attained?

All of these questions have been thrashed over many times in this House. There is no phase of any of them which has not been thoroughly studied and discussed, and all were answered by those who preceded us here, many years before any of us were elected. Nothing has been and nothing will be added to the sum of present knowledge by the discussion of the pending bill, either by those who favor or those who oppose the legislation. Nothing new will be said in this debate except it be the recital of some recent experiences, some newly developed facts, and they will confirm the well-considered theories and reaffirm and justify the judgment of students of the subject, rendered many years before our political lives began.

The subject is too broad, too comprehensive, to be treated even cursorily in the necessary limitations of a single address, and I shall therefore devote my time to the consideration of the single question of flood control.

Before passing to that subject let me state that after a century of examination and study by the most eminent engineers our country has produced, they have all agreed that the most practical and feasible means by which the floods can be controlled are identical with those by which the other purposes of its improvement can be accomplished. In other words, whether we improve the river solely in the interest of interstate commerce, either for "navigation" or "intercourse," or whether we improve it solely with a view to flood control, we must confine its waters between levees and fix its banks by revetment.

The area of the alluvial delta which can be protected from floods by a system of levees is 2,900 square miles. To express it differently, this is about the combined area of Delaware, Maryland, Connecticut, Rhode Island, and Massachusetts; larger by one-third than the two States of New Hampshire and Vermont; almost as large as the great States of Maine or South Carolina. There are, in round numbers, 20,000,000 acres, and of this 16,000,000 acres will be protected against the floods of the Mississippi by the completion of the levee lines already adopted. Only three and one-half million acres of this sixteen million are now in cultivation. In other words, after the levees now contemplated are completed, some 12,500,000 acres of this rich alluvial delta which is now uncultivated can be brought into profitable cultivation. There are no more fertile or productive lands in the world, and a great variety of crops are produced. In the upper reaches grain, corn, and wheat are the principal products; in the middle section cotton is the principal crop; below the mouth of the Red River, sugar and rice are the principal crops; and still further down oranges and other fruits abound.

The cotton which is produced is not of the ordinary variety, known in the market as "uplands"; it is of longer and stronger fiber, and commands a much higher price in the markets and is used in the manufacture of the finer cotton fabrics. Last year 110,000,000 pounds of cotton were imported from Egypt, which is the only competitor we have in this grade of cotton, but the Egyptian cotton is not as good as ours and does not command quite as high a price in the market. It is estimated by those who appeared before the committee that $700,000,000 annually can be produced in cotton alone, in addition to what is now grown in these deltas, if it were all put into cultivation.

I wish to make it plain, however, that Congress is not asked to embark upon any scheme of reclamation. What we ask is that the water which comes down upon us from the great States to the north of us, composing 41 per cent of the drainage area of the United States, be confined to the channel of the river, so that the people who live in the deltas can themselves reclaim the land.

Abraham Lincoln said that he could see no difference in principle in driving a pirate from the seas and in controlling the flood waters of the Mississippi River; and this is what the people in the lower valley are asking, and nothing more. It is frequently stated that the construction of levees will cause these wild lands, which are now estimated to be worth on an average $5 an acre, to immediately advance in price to $20 and even $50 an acre, but this is a mistake. The lands which are now in cultivation are worth about $50 an acre, but this value has come from the improvement of the land, from clearing the forests, from building houses, digging ditches, and, in fact, from converting the unproductive wilderness into fertile fields.

We have the uncontradicted testimony of those who live in the deltas, and who have had large experience in clearing wild land and putting it into cultivation, that it costs at least $50 an acre to do this. So that it is not an accurate statement to say that the Government of the United States is asked to reclaim these lands. We ask nothing of the sort. Ever since the question of controlling the floods of the lower river has engaged the attention of the Nation an almost infinite variety of schemes and plans and suggestions have been made, and after every destructive flood passes down the river the public prints of the country are filled with these same suggestions. In the early days of the Republic, when the river furnished the only means of transportation for the people in the valley, Congress was repeatedly appealed to to improve the river for the purpose of rendering its navigation possible.

The river was filled with snags and sand bars which made its navigation not only difficult, but to a high degree dangerous. Logs and snags would float down the river and be caught by the innumerable sand bars which came up within 2 or 3 feet of the surface of the water, and when the various types of water craft would attempt to navigate it they would strike these snags and sink, carrying down with them thousands of dollars of property and many human lives.

In 1822 Congress appointed a board of engineers to examine the river and report some plan for its improvement, and Bernard and Totten, of what was then called the topographic corps of engineers, made a report in which they declared that the only feasible method by which the river could be improved for navigation was by the construction of a system of dikes which would confine the flood waters to the channel, and in that way lower the crest of the bars and remove the dangerous obstructions. The population of the States of the great valley increased by leaps and bounds, and commerce borne on the river increased annually until New Orleans became in 1850 the third greatest export port in the world, surpassed only by London and Liverpool.

The people throughout the valley, aroused by the frequently recurring disasters to the commerce of the river caused by the wreck of the boats as they struck these innumerable snags, became more and more insistent that the Federal Government assume the burden of the river's improvement. Conventions were held at Memphis in 1845, at Chicago in 1847, and at Cincinnati. The purpose of these conventions was to arouse public interest and to force upon the attention of the whole nation the needs of the valley. The proceedings of these conventions are set out somewhat in detail in the supplemental report—part 2, report 300, Sixty-third Congress, second session—which was submitted by me with this bill.

The first fruits of this agitation were the bills passed by Congress known as the swamp and overflow land grants of 1850. These acts provided that the wet lands within the various States of the valley which had not at that time been sold should be donated to the several States in which they were situated, the proceeds of their sale to be expended by the States in the construction of "levees and drains." The practical operation of these laws, however, was really disastrous to the States in the lower Mississippi Valley, because the drainage of the States in the upper valley precipitated the surface waters into the lower valley so rapidly that the riparian owners on the lower river were unable to build their levees fast enough to take care of this increased volume.

Mr. Charles Ellet, jr., in 1852, after making an exhaustive study of the overflow problem on the lower river, pointed out this fact very vividly, and concluded his report with this very meaningful sentence:

> The process by which the country above is relieved is the process by which the country below is ruined.

The following figures tell the story very graphically: In 1850 the value of farm lands in the 11 States in the northern part of the valley, lying north of and between the Missouri and Ohio Rivers, was given by the census of 1850 at $828,000,000, in round numbers. The volume of the flood of 1858 was 1,475,000 cubic feet per second. This was the greatest flood which had occurred since dependable records had been kept by the Government. In 1880 land values in those same States had increased to $5,300,000,000, and the volume of the flood of 1882 was 1,800,000 cubic feet per second. In 1910 the land values of those States had increased to the incomprehensible total of $20,000,000,000, and the flood of 1912 reached a maximum of 2,300,000 cubic feet per second. I do not mean, of course, that all of the drainage activities of the upper valley States were financed by the sale of swamp and overflow lands. The figures I quote, however, verify the prophecy of Lieut. Ellet that—> the process by which the country above is relieved is the process by which the country below is ruined.

In 1851 Congress provided for an extensive survey and examination of the river, which was conducted by Capt. A. A. Humphreys, of the Corps of Engineers, assisted by Lieut. H. L. Abbot, and after a 10-year study of the subject in all its aspects they made the most elaborate report which has ever been made on the river; perhaps the most elaborate report ever made on any river. Still later, in 1866, Capt. Humphreys, who had then risen to the rank of brigadier general, and was Chief of Engineers of the Army, made another elaborate investigation and report to Congress. In 1874 another commission of engineers, headed by Gen. G. K. Warren, made still another investigation of the river and submitted a very complete report on the subject. In 1879 the Mississippi River Commission was created, consisting of three engineers from the Army Corps, one from the Coast and Geodetic Survey, two engineers from civil life, and one distinguished citizen. This commission has continued in existence from that day to this, and has been in active charge of all work on the river since its creation. It has made annual reports to Congress which fill many volumes, and has during its investigation studied and tested every proposition which the wit of the engineer could conjure up for the proper treatment of the river. In addition to the commissions above enumerated, which were composed of professional engineers, Congress has at various times appointed special committees to examine into the general subject of the river, notably the Burrow's committee in 1883, and the Nelson committee in 1898.

I have enumerated these various commissions because it has been suggested recently that Congress should appoint a special committee or commission to thrash over all the various plans which have been suggested for the improvement of the river and report back to Congress some definite scheme. The fact is, as above stated, that since the very beginning of interest in the improvement of the river a great number of commissions have been created, with the net result that more accurate data has been obtained about the Mississippi River than about any other river in all the world, and it is noteworthy and a fact that must certainly carry great weight, if not conviction, that there has been substantial agreement by all of these investigating bodies as to the plans and methods by which the lower river can be improved.

Bernard & Totten, in 1822, declared in their report, which was the first one, "The only means (of improvinng navigation) which appear practicable to us is the construction of dikes," and this conclusion has been reached by every other board which has since examined this subject.

A great many plans have been suggested, especially with reference to the question of flood protection, but all have been rejected by the engineers, either as impractical or as inadvisable, except the system of dikes or levees, together with bank revetment, which is designed to prevent the banks from caving into the river.

One year ago President Wilson, through the Secretary of War, requested the Mississippi River Commission to make a report on, first: How best to prevent the recurrence of destructive floods in the Mississippi River Basin; and, second, how to prevent or reduce to a minimum the damages which might be caused by such floods. This report states succinctly and very briefly the numerous methods which have been suggested, with the judgment of the commission thereon. The reasons for these conclusions are set out at great length in the reports by the commissions above referred to, and also in the very elaborate reports of the Mississippi River Commission. It will be sufficient, however, for this discussion simply to quote the report of the commission in answer to the President's questions, and if anyone desires to examine any of the particular propositions, which are very briefly discussed in the report, I think he will be able to find all the data necessary for a full understanding of the question set out in more detail in the supplemental report which I have submitted with this bill and which is printed as part 2 of House Report No. 300.

The report of the commission last year concluded as follows:

(1) Reforestation: While forests may have some influence on a river during midstages they produce little effect either during extreme floods or extreme low water. It takes too long a time for trees to grow and the humus to form under them for reforestation to be a practical solution of flood prevention in the Mississippi Basin. It would also require the abandonment of too much land needed for agricultural purposes.

(2) Reservoirs: In a mountainous country, where short, high dams can create reservoirs of great depth and volume, or in a comparatively level country, where low dams can form lakes of large area, it may be practicable to control floods by means of reservoirs. There is but a comparatively small section of the Mississippi Basin that fulfills either of these conditions, and in such areas the rainfall is generally light. The rolling country, which forms the greater part of the Mississippi Valley and from which the water that produces its floods is derived, can be protected from floods by reservoirs only by an enormous expenditure.

(3) Cut-offs: By cutting off the bends in a river, its length is diminished and slope increased. This would increase its discharge at a given height. This method of relief can not be applied to the Mississippi River, as it would seriously injure its navigability during low water, and increase the caving of its banks, which is now excessive. While it would afford relief in the upper portions of the section of the river thus straightened, it would increase flood heights at the lower end, benefiting one locality at the expense of another.

(4) Outlets: Outlets, while locally reducing flood heights, have only limited application as a means of relief from Mississippi floods. They can not be constructed above the mouth of Red River; their influence on flood heights extends only comparatively short distances above the locality where they are constructed; there is a tendency for the river to diminish its area of cross section below them; they have to be protected by levees of the same dimensions as the river itself; and there is danger, if the outlet is made sufficiently large to be of practicable value, that the river may abandon its present channel and adopt that of the outlet. (The subject is further discussed in Annual Reports of the Mississippi River Commission for 1881, 1882, 1884, 1885, 1890–91, 1893, and 1912.)

(5) Diversion of flood waters into channels parallel to the main river: The maximum flood discharge of the Mississippi River exceeds 2,000,000 second-feet, while it discharges about 1,000,000 second-feet at a bank-full stage. A side channel which would discharge the excess flood waters would therefore require an area of cross section equal to that of the river itself at bank-full stage, and with the same characteristics as to depth and velocity.

(6) Levees: Levees afford the only practicable means of preventing the damages which might be caused by floods in the lower Mississippi Valley. They have been successfully employed on European rivers, and are the only means of flood protection of large rivers that have been tested, or, if tested, have not failed. To restrain floods like those of 1912 and 1913 will require in the existing levee line about twice the yardage now in place. The estimated cost of such an enlargement is $57,000,000. Levee construction has not raised the bed of the Mississippi River.

C. McD. Townsend,
Colonel, Corps of Engineers.

The levee system has certainly been put to the test of time, and, if it is not the correct theory, certainly there should be no difficulty in finding instances somewhere in the history of the world where the defects of the system have been manifested. As early as the twelfth dynasty the Pharaohs of Egypt were building levees along the Nile for the control of its floods, and in all the rivers of Europe and Asia, whose valleys are subject to annual overflows, levees have been resorted to as a means of their control. This was true in the early days of Assyria on the Euphrates, and on the Tigris. They have been employed continuously on the Po and other rivers in Europe, and there is no disagreement among engineers who have made a particular study of river hydraulics as to the efficiency of levees as a means of flood control. On the Mississippi River the system has been subjected to the test of experience since the first settlement at New Orleans in 1717, and wherever they have been constructed of proper height and section they have universally proven successful as a barrier against floods. The present levee line, counting both sides of the river, is approximately 1,500 miles long. It has been constructed very largely by the tax money raised by the people themselves who live in the overflowed valley. Since the Civil War these people have raised something more than seventy million dollars, and during that same period something more than thirty million has been appropriated by the Federal Government for levee construction.

As noted in the report which I have quoted heretofore, the Mississippi River Commission estimates that it will require $57,000,000 more to build the levees up to a grade and section sufficient to withstand any flood which has ever come down the river. In fact, this proposed levee would be 3 feet higher than any flood that has heretofore been known. All three of the great political parties at the last election declared specifically and unequivocally in favor of the Federal Government's undertaking the control and prevention of floods in the lower valley, and Mr. Wilson, Col. Roosevelt, and Mr. Taft all declared in their public addresses during the campaign that they believed this to be a duty which the Federal Government owed; that the problem was too great a one for solution by local interests, and that Congress must undertake the solution of the great and expensive problem. The Republican platform committed that party to the proposition that the Federal Government should contribute "a fair proportion" of the funds necessary. It is perfectly apparent to anyone that if we are to do this work we must set about the task in a more businesslike manner than has characterized our actions heretofore.

The bill which is being advocated by all the levee boards in the lower valley, and which is usually referred to in the press as the Ransdell-Humphreys bill, proposes that the funds necessary for the completion of the levees be provided in five annual appropriations, the Federal Government to contribute nine millions a year during that time and the local interests to contribute three millions a year. Of course if we extend the appropriations over 10 or 15 years the estimate of fifty-seven millions will be found much too small, and for this reason: Floods come down the river every few years; the longest period of immunity ever experienced was nine years—1903 to 1912—and if the levees are incompleted when the next flood comes, they will be overtopped and breached and great sections will be washed away and the whole line of the incomplete levees weakened. The ultimate cost will, therefore, be increased, and this increase will grow in exact proportion as the delay subjects the line to and really invites repeated disaster.

In addition to this if we are to rely upon the local interests to contribute a fair proportion of the cost, we should see to it that their resources from which they are to make their contributions are not necessarily dissipated by recurring disastrous floods. To illustrate, after the flood of 1912 the Mississippi River Commission was instructed to make a very careful investigation for the purpose of ascertaining what destruction had been wrought by that flood, and their report shows that $41,000,000 in property was destroyed along the lower reaches of the river.

This flood, as we know, was followed by the flood of 1913, and while the crevasses were fewer in this flood, and fortunately occurred at points much farther down than the crevasses of 1912, the destruction of property at that time was reported at $10,000,000. The loss, then, in actual property destroyed was $50,000,000 in the two years of 1912 and 1913. We can not, of course, look to these local interests to make any substantial contribution to the fund for the completion of the levees unless disasters such as these can be prevented. In addition to this, when the line is uncompleted and is not high enough or strong enough to withstand a great flood, thousands and tens of thousands of dollars are expended in the rush and hurry of an emergency campaign in purely temporary work.

Such work is not only temporary, and of no permanent value, but as a matter of fact is destructive. To illustrate: The river rises to the top of the levee and threatens to run over it, and thereby destroy it. Thousands of men assemble on the levee, dig dirt back of the levee, put it into sacks, and pile the sacks on the top of the levee to hold back the flood. After the water subsides these sacks have to be emptied and the dirt put back to strengthen the line which was weakened by its removal.

Col. Townsend, president of the Mississippi River Commission, stated in his testimony before the committee that whereas they had prevented the levees from being breached at a number of threatened points in 1913, this success had been brought about by the expenditure of a million dollars in emergency work. Of the $4,000,000 which Congress appropriated for levee work in the bill of 1912, two millions were spent in rebuilding levees that had washed away. In addition to this, Maj. Normoyle, of the Quartermaster's Department, reported that he had fed and sheltered 272,000 people during that flood, in addition to live stock, and the Appropriations Committee later on in that year appropriated more than a million dollars to reimburse the Secretary of War for funds which he had expended in this relief work.

Mr. Robert Somerville, assistant engineer of the Lower Yazoo levee district, in a letter which is published in the report, gives figures to show that that one district, with a levee line of less than 200 miles, has expended since 1882 more than a million dollars in these temporary works in emergency campaigns, and gives it as his opinion that 95 per cent of the funds so expended was in work of no permanent value whatever. From these statements it must be clear that the work ought to proceed with such expedition as will reasonably insure against the recurrence of the disasters which make the expenditure of these large amounts necessary.

In addition to this, we should provide for carrying this work on continuously; that is, by authorizing the Secretary of War to enter into such contracts for materials and labor as will enable the work to proceed upon a definite plan instead of limiting him by a system of annual appropriations to only one season's work at a time. Contractors are willing to do the work for very much less per cubic yard if they can be given a contract which will run through several years. The reasons for this are too patent to call for amplification. Judge Taylor, who has been a member of the Mississippi River Commission for more than 30 years, gave it as his opinion that 20 per cent could be saved by doing the work within five years under the continuing-contract system; and Maj. Ockerson, also a member of the commission for 30 years, stated that he believed the saving would be 25 per cent. Col. Townsend gave no estimate of the per cent that could be saved, but urged the committee to adopt such a course that would make it certain that the work could be continued at some given rate of appropriation through a series of years. He stated that by this method, if contractors would not reduce their bids, the commission would be able to acquire the necessary plant and equipment and do the work by hired labor.

The only answer to this is that hereafter the commission will do the work itself and not let it out to contractors. It will be necessary in that event for them to acquire the necessary plant and equipment, and having done that it is assumed that Congress would be certain to provide the necessary funds by annual appropriations. It had been suggested by a great many that the machinery ought to be brought up from the Panama Canal and used on the Mississippi River in the construction of levees. I do not believe that anyone who has made a serious study of the problem thought this to be practicable or possible, but in order to settle the question Col. Goethals was asked to appear before the Senate committee and he there stated most emphatically that the old machinery used at Panama was in no way suitable for the work to be done on the Mississippi River.

He further stated, in reference to continuing contracts, that if the piecemeal policy of appropriations which we are pursuing in the prosecution of levee work on the Mississippi had been followed at Panama, he could never have completed that great work in the time in which it has been done or for the same expenditure of money.

There are one or two other points to which I would like to call the attention of the House, although they are set out very fully in my report. The first is that it is not simply whether this great valley shall be protected from overflow by the Federal Government or by the people who live in the valley. The question in fact is this: Shall these floods be controlled by the Federal Government or shall the protected deltas be abandoned? The local interests can not do the work unaided. There is no justice in requiring that they should attempt it. We have already built our levees high enough and strong enough to protect us against any flood that ever could have come down the river but for the activities of the citizens of the great States to the north of us. The figures I have already given make this very clear. We started into this fight, or at least our fathers did, against the forces of nature at the same time. The pioneers of the Northern States went out to subdue the wilderness and so did the pioneers in the deltas of the Mississippi. As the innumerable natural reservoirs, the lakes, sloughs, and slashes of the States to the north of us were drained the dwellers in the lower valley were compelled to build their levees higher and higher. But we were making reasonably good progress until the great disaster of the war between the States came on us. It is impossible to conceive the awful horror of those four years of blood and strife.

The figures taken from the census reports showing the values of farm property will tell their own story. Take the 11 States of the upper valley, for instance, and the 3 States of the lower valley—Arkansas, Louisiana, and Mississippi. In 1850 the value of farm lands in the 11 Northern States was, in round numbers, $800,000,000; in the 3 Southern States, $200,000,000. In 1860 the 3 States had increased more than 300 per cent, the farm values then being $607,000,000. Now mark the decline. In 1870 these values had fallen to $213,000,000, a decrease in the one item of farm values of $400,000,000. All of us know the story of the political history of the years which immediately followed the close of the great war, and none of us takes any pride whatever in it. During the years of the war, when all levee construction and protection were necessarily abandoned the floods came in increased numbers and fury. In the single State of Mississippi alone 107 miles of levees had been completely swept away when Gen. Humphreys made his report in 1866. As a fitting cap to this climax of disasters Congress levied a tax of $15 per bale on cotton during the years 1866, 1867, and 1868. In 1880 more than one-half of the lands in the delta country had been forfeited to the States for taxes, and the fight against the annually increasing floods had been abandoned as hopeless.

In the meantime, however, the development of the States in the northern valley had been nothing short of marvelous. Farms which had been valued at $800,000,000 in 1850 in 1880, when the lower valley States lay prostrate, had increased to the magnificent total of $5,000,000,000. In 1905 farm values in the three lower valley States had finally reached the high point which they had attained in 1860, 45 years before, whereas by the census of 1910 farm values in the 11 upper valley States had grown to the immeasurable total of $20,000,000,000. In other words, the handicap had been so great that the farmers of the lower valley had been utterly unable to keep the pace in levee construction made necessary by the perfect drainage systems in the northern States of the valley indicated by the figures above quoted.

As a matter of course, we all rejoice in the marvelous development, growth, and prosperity of the northern valley States, and there is nothing that we would not gladly do to make permanent and accelerate that splendid forward march; but we do believe that there is justice in our request now that we be extended a helping hand in our efforts to carry on to the sea, robbed of its habits of destruction, the enormous increase in the surplus and surface waters which are being precipitated upon us.

There are 16,000,000 acres of wonderfully fertile land, not marshland but highland, which would be protected from overflow, if the present levee lines were completed to the grade and section contemplated by the engineers. We have been unable so far, however, to subject more than three and one-half million acres of it to cultivation. We have raised by self-imposed taxes $70,000,000, which we have put into these levees, and we are offering now to put up fifteen millions more, all of which has been and must be produced from these three and one-half million acres. In doing this we have resorted to every scheme of taxation which the wit of man could devise. The following extract from the report will justify this statement:

"First, they provided an ad valorem levee tax, greater than the combined State and county taxes for all other purposes. This was collected on all assessable property, both real and personal. In addition to this, they imposed an acreage tax. Then there was a tax on privileges; that is to say, a tax on every occupation from storekeeper to the man who drives a cart for hire. Nobody was exempt, except preachers and doctors. Then they had a produce tax, varying in different districts. A dollar a bale on cotton, a tax on every ton of hay, every barrel of sugar, every bag of rice, every gallon of molasses, every barrel of oysters.

"The only system which escaped their tax assessors was the system adopted in Egypt, known as corvee. Corvee is the system by which the obligation is imposed upon all the inhabitants in the country to labor gratuitously on the levees. Yes; there is one other system which apparently was overlooked. Herodotus tells us that the old Pharaoh, Sesostris, left many inscriptions upon the monuments erected by him in Egypt, in which he testified to the fact that the great dikes and embankments built by him along the banks of the Nile to protect their country from inundation had been constructed by captives taken in war and 'that no native was employed in the laborious part of the undertaking.' It is evident from this that even in those ancient days distinguished gentlemen who held offices of high importance in the State paid proper regard to vox populi, and were careful to give assurance that the foreigner paid the tax. They had no prisoners of war in these deltas; the only ones were the convicts, and these were so employed."

I have always believed that Adam Bede had my constituents in mind when he told us a few years ago on the floor of this House the hard-luck story of the man—

> Whose horse went dead and his mule went lame
> And he lost his cow in a poker game,
> And a cyclone came on a summer day
> And blew the house where he lived away.
> Then an earthquake came when that was gone,
> And swallowed the ground that the house stood on;
> Then the tax collector, he came 'round
> And charged him up with the hole in the ground.

There is one other matter that I want to mention, and I will again read from my report:

DO LEVEES CAUSE THE BED OF THE RIVER TO FILL?

"In 1890 another great flood came down the river, and the levees in their uncompleted condition were unable to withstand the pressure and were breeched in many places. The disaster from this flood was very great. In addition to the destruction of property, much of the work theretofore done on the levees was, of course, swept away. The flood level was much higher this year, although the volume of water in the river was less than it had been in previous extreme floods. This was inevitable, of course, because the water which had formerly been permitted to spread over vast areas, bounded only by the hills on either side of the valley, was now confined by the levees, and instead of spreading over a valley from 40 to 80 miles wide it was forced to pass between embankments only 3 to 5 miles apart. The casual observer noted that as the levees rose higher the flood elevation was correspondingly higher, and the theory which had been advanced many years before, that the construction of levees would cause the bed of the river to rise, was again brought forward and urged with great persistence. This has always been a very popular, though fallacious, theory. No one is interested in the gauge when the river is low, and therefore no one looks at it or regards it. There is no danger then; but the fact is that the low-water level has not been raised, as would be the case had the channel filled. If a quart of water is poured into a pint measure, it will inevitably overflow, unless the sides of the measure are raised. In that event there will be no overflow, but the water will stand much higher in the measure. It will not prove that the bottom of the measure has been raised, however. There is nothing new about this theory, though many of its proponents seem to think so.

"A hundred years ago M. de Prony, a French engineer, traveling through Italy, in some way got the notion into his head that the Po, by reason of the levees along its banks, had silted up its bed, and in an essay published on the subject shortly after he returned to France he announced this discovery. This was the beginning of the theory. Lombardini, a noted Italian engineer, after a most elaborate investigation and study of the Po from its earliest available records, completely and thoroughly exposed and refuted this error. About 1855, or a little later perhaps, the Abbe Huc traveled extensively in China and subsequently wrote a very interesting and entertaining book on his travels. In this book he stated that the Yellow River had, by reason of the construction of levees along its banks, so filled its bed that the bottom of the river was higher than the adjacent country. To this fact he attributed the great disaster of 1853, when that river broke through the levees and made a new channel for itself to the sea. It is remarkable how many people have heard this story of the Yellow River who, of course, never read this pious old father's book. Judge Taylor, of the Mississippi River Commisssion, in an address delivered in New Orleans a number of years ago said:

"I often wonder how so many people get hold of that idea who have so few others.

"To one who has made so thorough an investigation of the subject as Judge Taylor, who has drunk so deep at the Pierian spring, these theorists no doubt do appear thoroughly stupid. The fact is, however, that many people who are very far from being stupid, and who do have a great many "other ideas," and sensible ideas too, have gotten hold of this one; and, curiously enough, when once they have gotten it into their heads, they hold to it with a tenacity which is as unchangeable as it is inexplicable. It is indeed difficult to understand the psychology of it. There seems to be some subtle and mysterious influence by which it reaches the ego. It evidently flatters the vanity of men, and in that way insinuates itself into their intellectual favor; but be that as it may, the unfortunate, stubborn fact is that having once heard it, no man ever forgets it, and few who believe it ever abandon the faith. Tell him a hundred things about the Mississippi River and then relate this story; he will forget the hundred facts, but he will not only remember this fallacy, he will take pains to impart it to every other man who will listen to him discourse upon the subject.

"Gen. Wilson, of the Army Engineer Corps, visited China and made a visit to the Yellow River to study, if possible, this most unnatural phenomenon. In his book, written upon his return, he devotes some space to the old abbe's story, but gave it as his opinion that it was wholly inaccurate. He subsequently wrote a letter to Gen. Comstock, who read it to the Rivers and Harbors Committee in the hearings of 1890. Gen. Comstock's statement so illumines this whole subject that it is printed in full elsewhere. This hearing (1890) is one of the most interesting and instructive ever had on the engineering problems of the Mississippi, and its perusal is earnestly recommended.

"The late Col. Smith S. Leach was universally regarded as one of the greatest engineers ever employed on the work of controlling the floods of the Mississippi River. He was for 12 years in active charge of this great work. In an article contributed to the Manufacturers' Record many years ago, speaking of this hypothesis—I say hypothesis advisedly, because it has never risen to the dignity of theory—he said:

"If any proposition more than another is inconsistent with everything that has been stated in this paper, it is one which has obtained wide currency and on which opposition to levee building is largely based, that levees cause deposits in the channel and thereby raise the bed of the river. The votaries of this doctrine ignore the testimony of the Mississippi itself, which is conclusive against them, and depend upon an alleged analogy with the Yellow River of China, about which no one knows anything, and with the Po, of which everything that is known refutes their hypothesis.

"The only leveed rivers in the world where the bed has silted up are those rivers which flow from a high elevation down a steep, inclined plane, and suddenly debouch into a level country. These are silted up, not because they are leveed, but in spite of that fact. The Sacramento River in California is a good illustration. In the early days of California (1849), immediately succeeding the discovery of gold, the principal activities of the people were directed toward the mining of gold in the mountains. The process was hydraulic mining, which literally tore the mountains to pieces and in the course of years washed the débris down the mountain slopes in tremendous quantities. It was discovered all too late that this particular method of mining would inevitably destroy the navigable streams. Col. Townsend, in an address delivered at Memphis, Tenn., September 26, 1912, said, speaking of this contention:

"The assertion is now admitted to be false on the main rivers of all civilized countries which are capable of being studied, but it is still claimed that it is true in China and Japan. I recently visited Japan and had an opportunity to further investigate the subject. On the larger rivers, like the Osaka, there were no evidences of any such action, but in mountain streams which flow down steep hillsides and suddenly change their slope when they pass through plains, as is the case with a number of streams which empty into Lake Biwa, the upper portions of the streams have been scoured out, forming deep gullies, and the material thus eroded deposited at the foot of the hills.

"This description fits the situation in the case of the Sacramento perfectly. Continuing, he stated his opinion:

"My own view of the effect of levees on stream flow is that they tend to remove irregularities and make the slope more uniform. * * * They should also, to a certain extent, enlarge the river section, but at a rate so low that it would be a question of practical importance to those who will inhabit the valley in the twenty-fifth century, rather than those who are tilling it to-day.

"Humphreys and Abbott had investigated this theory 50 years before, had traced its genesis and demonstrated its fallacy. The Commission of Engineers appointed in compliance with the act of June 22, 1874, 'to report a permanent plan for the reclamation of the alluvial basin of the Mississippi River' had reported that 'This idea is utterly without good foundation either in theory or experience.' (H. Ex. Doc. 127, 43d Cong., 2d sess.) Every engineer who has ever been set to work on the question has broken and shattered the old vase, but the scent of the old priest and the French de Prony still cling to the fragments. 'I don't know why I love you, but I do,' is still the only reply of its votaries. Congress, however, wanted a better answer. If the bottom of the river was filling up as fast as the levees were made higher, of course it would be a useless and senseless waste of money to continue appropriations for the building of levees, and so the Committee on Rivers and Harbors summoned before them the most expert engineers in the corps, and called upon them for enlightenment and advice on this subject. The hearings were full and the fallacy of the contention clearly, and it was hoped finally, demonstrated."

It will not be possible to follow this subject further. I have endeavored merely to refer to the various points which have occurred to me, but have not undertaken to elaborate them, because my time and your patience are both already exhausted. If any gentleman wishes to pursue the subject further and to study it in detail, I believe the report which I have submitted with this bill will give the information desired and, I hope, will lead him to the conclusion that our cause is a just one, and that the great project which was undertaken so many years ago ought now to be pushed to a speedy and happy completion.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, the provision we are now considering in this bill, in effect, provides for Government aid for levees on the upper river, under the direction of the Mississippi River Commission. The Mississippi River is a national proposition. Every Member of this House was elected on a platform which provided for Government aid for levees along the entire Mississippi River. The platforms of the three great parties contain planks pledging the party to the proposition we are now considering. This bill provides liberally for the Mississippi River. Seven million dollars are appropriated for the purpose of channel work, bank preservation, and levee building. The original act creating the Mississippi River Commission, the act of 1879, gives to the commission jurisdiction over levees all the way from the Head of Passes to the headwaters of the river.

THE MISSISSIPPI A NATIONAL PROBLEM.

The Mississippi River is a national river. The water which falls on nearly one-half the territory of the United States ultimately finds it way into this great river. It receives the drainage of 25 of our greatest States. The most fertile lands in the world are found along its banks. It is unfair and unjust to expect communities along its banks without national aid to protect themselves from the great floods which occur nearly every year in this the greatest river on the continent. It is unfair to expect States along its banks to protect their citizens without national aid. Heretofore appropriations for levees along the Mississippi River have been confined to levees south of the Ohio River. In the last river and harbor bill, without opposition, we extended the area of Government aid for levees as far north as Cape Girardeau, Mo. This bill appropriates for the Mississippi River $1,000,000 more than the appropriations contained in the last river and harbor bill, and it extends the area of Government aid for levees as far north as Rock Island, Ill., and it provides that any part of the $7,000,000 appropriated for the river and which may be allotted by the Mississippi River Commission for levees may be expended upon levees on any part of the river between the Head of Passes and Rock Island in such manner as, in the opinion of the commission, will best improve navigation and promote the interest of commerce at all stages of the river.

The paragraph we are considering contains the same limitations under which Government aid has been extended to levees on the lower river. The river and harbor bill of last year contained an appropriation of $200,000 providing for levee surveys on the upper river, the balance remaining after the surveys were paid for to be expended for levees on the upper river under the direction of the Mississippi River Commission. The surveys have been completed at a cost of $10,000, and the balance of the $200,000 has been allotted to various levee districts along the river. This appropriation does not conflict in any way with the organic act creating the Mississippi River Commission. It is in entire harmony with it.

FLOODS ON THE UPPER RIVER.

It is just as difficult to fight floods on the upper river as on the lower river. On the stretch of river we are considering, the extreme range in stage at Rock Island between 1872 and 1912 was 20.5 feet, while the average flood stage for this entire period of 40 years was 12.5 feet at this point. The bank-full stage, however, at Rock Island occurs at about 12 feet. At Cairo, Ill., the maximum oscillation between high and low water is 54.7 feet, and the average flood stage is 45 feet. At Greenville, Miss., the water of the river must rise 90 or 100 feet before it reaches the bank-full stage. In other words, the Mississippi River, in its journey to the sea, has worn out for itself a great channel, and the nearer you get to the sea the deeper the channel is and the more room there is within the channel for the waters of the river. When the upper river overflows its banks, the same problems occur as on the lower river, and it reaches the bank-full stage on the upper river much quicker than it does on the lower river.

LEVEES ON UPPER RIVER MORE DURABLE.

I am familiar with the Mississippi River over its entire course from its headwaters to the sea. I have seen by daylight every foot of its banks. I have studied the problems it presents for many years. It is easier to build levees on the upper river than on the lower river. The material for levee building is better. A dollar of Government money expended on the upper river will accomplish more than it will on the lower river. Work done on the upper river is permanent and will stand. The upper river does not shift its channel. It does not wander about in a wide valley. When it overflows its banks and breaks levees, it returns again to its old channel; and in order to make the levee as good as it ever was it is only necessary to repair the break. The lower river is a graveyard of levees. It is difficult to find any point on the river from which you can not see more than one ruined levee standing out on its banks. In time of flood the Mississippi River changes its course, and miles and miles of levees are destroyed, thousands of acres of land are ruined, and a new levee must be built in an absolutely new location to accommodate the changing river. This condition does not prevail on the upper river. Government money expended on the upper river is well expended, and improvements made thereby become as permanent as improvements of that character can be on any river in the world. There are no levees crumbling into the river north of Cape Girardeau. The river's banks are permanent.

UPPER RIVER LEVEES BUILT AND MAINTAINED WITHOUT GOVERNMENT AID.

The report just made by the Mississippi River Commission shows that all levees on the upper river are deficient in grade and in height. They have been built without Government aid. Communities of farmers have built them. They have taxed themselves to the utmost in their efforts to maintain them. There are 52 levee and drainage districts in the stretch of the river between Cape Girardeau, Mo., and Rock Island, Ill. Twenty-six of these districts are in Illinois. The rest are in Iowa and Missouri. In Illinois alone we are maintaining at the present time 216 miles of levees. In this upper stretch of the river farmers have expended in these various drainage districts the enormous sum of $10,000,000 in an attempt to control the waters of the river.

IMMENSE AREA OF FERTILE LAND BACK OF THESE LEVEES.

In these 52 levee districts there are 782,000 acres of fertile lands, as rich as the lands in the delta of the Nile. With proper protection from floods, this immense area will produce as much corn as the Argentine Republic will ever produce for export. Back of these insufficient levees we are raising now all the cereals. Properly protected from floods, this great area will yield every year from thirty-five to forty-five millions of dollars worth of wheat and corn and oats and potatoes. With much less Government aid than the lower Mississippi River is receiving, we will be able on the upper river to make this tremendous contribution every year to the wealth of the Nation. With our increasing population, the question of food supply presents itself with greater force every year. If this provision is enacted into law, in these three great agricultural States of the Middle West we will be able to do our full share toward solving the problems of the high cost of living.

THE SNY DISTRICT.

The most important of all these levee and drainage districts is the Sny district, commencing just below Quincy, Ill., and extending along the river to a point just above Hamburg, Ill., 52 miles in length. The levee here, which has been built by the farmers who live back of it, protects 110,000 acres of land. I know more about the Sny district than I do about the others, because it lies within the boundaries of my congressional district. The farms in this great section are small. The men who own them live on them. This district was built over 30 years ago, and the farmers who live there have expended on the levee up to the present time nearly one and one-half millions of dollars. The breaking of a levee of this kind and the breaking of any levee along the upper river means much more than the breaking of a levee along the lower river. In order to live on the upper river farmers must build substantial farmhouses and outbuildings. Their families and their stock must be protected against the colder winters of that section. Farmers who live there are accustomed to a high standard of living. On the lower river in the levee-protected farming sections the houses and outbuildings are inexpensive. The destruction of a home carries with it no great loss. When the waters recede it can be rebuilt again with a minimum outlay of time and money.

Corn lands are just as valuable as cotton lands. In our scheme of civilization they are just as important. On this great national river of ours they are entitled to the same consideration. We have the right to ask that this bill, when it becomes a law, shall contain this provision. As an act of simple justice the policy of Government aid for levees on the upper river should be established and should continue through future years.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I reside in that part of the great State of Illinois known and designated as Egypt. At the junction of the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers is located the city of Cairo. It is a splendid city of 15,000 inhabitants. The House has often heard of another Cairo located on a great river, and particularly of the fertility of that historic Cairo on that great river located in the land of the original Egypt. Of the richness of that Egypt about which you have read in history there can be no doubt; but I desire to say the Egypt of Illinois, for fertility and richness, is second to no place on earth.

Cairo, which is located in the fork of these two mighty rivers, was founded in the early history of Illinois. It was at that time destined to be the metropolis of the Mississippi Valley and would have been except for the fact that, surrounded as it was then and is now by lowlands, it has had to cease building to its just proportions to constantly and continuously fight the great floods that come upon it almost annually. Its geographical location is the proper place for the greatest city in the Mississippi Valley. But on account of its natural drawback suburbs like St. Louis and Chicago, whose locations have been more favored by nature, have to the present time outstripped in growth the proper hub city. I can not sit here without raising my voice in interest of the citizens of Cairo, whose hearts are constantly throbbing with the hope that the Government, which owns and controls these rivers, will do its duty by making such appropriations as will enable us to attain our proper and normal growth among the cities of the Mississippi Valley.

This committee is now denying us the privilege of an appropriation, because in its wisdom some engineer, about a year ago, made an investigation and found that the Government, in the Sixty-second Congress came to its senses and made us a conditional appropriation of $250,000 about two years ago. This appropriation was made upon the condition that Cairo raised a similar amount. The 1912 flood moved you to give this appropriation, and in 1913 we had a more ruinous and a more disastrous flood than in 1912; and now you turn your deaf ear to us because a Government engineer says, on July 1, 1913, this conditional appropriation of $250,000 is still unused.

Now, the condition of that appropriation was such that the city of Cairo must raise a like amount by taxation or some other manner. We could not do that in the twinkle of an eye. We were already taxed the limit, and an act for special taxation was passed by the legislature of our State in order that we might raise more money to protect ourselves from the floods of the Government-owned rivers. We met the conditions imposed upon us by taxation, donations, or otherwise. At this time you do not have a balance of $250,000 in the Treasury.

You let us have this money on account of the 1912 flood. Before the conditions of this appropriation could be met, another and a worse and more disastrous flood came upon us, doing untold damage to our levees; requiring more work and expense to rebuild and strengthen the levees than was anticipated at the time this appropriation was made.

My people, who do not have any property rights in these rivers, are taxing the clothes on their backs to pay for the control of Government property; the State of Illinois, that owns no property in these rivers, has responded in a large appropriation to pay for the control of this same Government property; and now all political parties acknowledge that the control of these rivers is a national problem and duty. Why do you not loosen up and do your avowed duty to assist in saving the millions of dollars' worth of homes and property that is likely to be swept away; and, more than that, why do not you do your duty to try to save the many lives that may be lost on account of your procrastination and delay?

Burdened by unbearable and almost unreasonable taxation and bowed down by the annual water fights we must make to save our homes and lives, we suppliantly implore you to perform your just obligations to our suffering humanity.

Thus far I have directed by remarks to the cold and indifferent and, as I regard it, the unjust attitude of the Rivers and Harbors Committee. But, in passing, allow me to say that my respect for the personnel of this committee is high and exalted. I know they are men of good intentions and I realize that their task is not an easy one.

Mr. Chairman, I will now turn my attention to one of the provisions of this bill that I do heartily approve of, and that is the extension of the jurisdiction of the Mississippi River Commission from the Head of Passes to Rock Island, Ill. If this provision had not been placed in this bill, I should have occupied, during the consideration of this bill, a seat by the warm side of my esteemed friend from Texas, Mr. CALLAWAY, in opposition to it.

The Mississippi River, the Father of Waters, is now recognized by all as a national problem. It should never have been looked upon in any other light from the formation of the Government to this very time. There never has been a time since the formation of the Mississippi River Commission that it should not have had control of the Mississippi River from its mouth to Rock Island, Ill.

My modesty prevents me from claiming any special glory for the action of this committee in extending the jurisdiction of the Mississippi River Commission, but I am thankful that I did appear before this committee during its deliberation upon the matter of this extension of jurisdiction. Had it received the verdict of deaf ears upon this matter, I should, indeed, have believed that this committee was composed of a cold and unjust membership.

For years extensive levee building has been conducted south of Cairo on the Mississippi River. This work has held in a large measure the waters within the confines of these levees. This has caused the river to almost annually overflow north of Cairo. Vast areas of farm lands, the entire length of my district, have been almost annually submerged on account of the fact that the Government was controlling and harnessing the waters of the lower Mississippi. From the bed of the river on the Illinois side for miles back are the finest bottom farm lands in the world. I have seen thousands of acres of grain almost ripe and ready for the sickle swept away in one day's time, entailing a loss of multiplied thousands of dollars to our farmers. Thousands of acres of corn and other farm products have been destroyed almost in the twinkling of an eye by the ravages of the flood waters of the river. This territory is densely populated with as sturdy farmers as God ever put the breath of life into. Their labors and savings have been swept from them time after time; they have been driven to the hills and upland to save their lives. These farmers have taxed themselves and are now taxing themselves to the limit to construct drainage districts and build levees to protect their all.

Our troubles and expenses have doubled on account of the Government work on the lower Mississippi. Government work there has been done at our expense, but now we think we may begin to see light of day. With this Government aid my people will take new courage. They will now begin to think their hope of life is not in vain and that their prayers for their homes and families will be answered.

It is now that these farmers can have hope to claim their land as their own. With this contemplated construction of levees the river will be held where it is. Heretofore it has changed its course over night and many farmers have lost title to all they owned in as short a time. This will materially aid both navigation and commerce. By holding the river within its banks it will become deeper and with a better current, making its waters more navigable for boats and ships. The enormous crops raised upon the lands thus protected will furnish millions of tons of commerce.

Mr. Chairman, it would not be out of place for me to say a few words at this time in the interest of the farmer. If you will look at the report of the Department of Agriculture, you will find the total value of farm products for any given year. For the year 1913 it was, in round numbers, $9,000,000,000. You will then realize what the value of the products of farms is to the basic wealth of this country. You will appreciate also with great force the disastrous effect our Nation suffers if this wealth is lost for any given year.

We have great and vast deposits of minerals—such as coal, gold, silver, oil, and so forth—all over our country. The value and wealth of these minerals are untold, and the annual output adds much to our wealth and prosperity annually. A strike may come and little or no wealth may be accumulated from our mineral resources in a given year or for any length of time. But the value of these minerals is not lost, never to be regained, to the commercial assets of our country. These minerals still remain under the earth and will be produced into wealth and value at another time. Our country's suffering is only one of delay.

On the other hand, when the crops of the farm are lost and their value destroyed for a year or a season, there is no recovery from this loss. When one year's crop is gone its value is lost to mankind forever. An hour of time that is idled away can never be returned. The value of its usefulness to mankind is forever gone. So with the loss of the product of the farm for the season. There is nothing to compensate for the loss.

The part of the Mississippi Valley where I have the privilege to reside, and the people whom I have the honor to represent, is one of the most fertile spots on earth, and is peopled by as intelligent and honorable a lot of farmers as can be found in the world. These people furnish much of the wealth of our Nation annually. Many times of recent years we have been unable to contribute our share of the wealth of our Nation because the Nation-owned Mississippi River has been allowed to run rampant upon our farms and destroy our earnings. For a distance of more than 100 miles, the entire length of my district on the west, these annual disasters have come like a mad monster of destruction, carrying before it crops, homes, and often many lives. Almost annually from the north line of Randolph, the northernmost county in my district, to the Ohio River on the south, you can behold a level plain of waste, want, and suffering caused by the overflow of the Mississippi River.

In 1778 Col. George Rogers Clarke, who ranks in history not second to Hannibal under authority of Virginia, set out to conquer the Illinois Territory, where the English governor of Detroit was inciting the western Indians to make war against American frontier settlers. From Fort Vincennes, now in Indiana, he sailed down the Ohio River by the city of Cairo, at the junction of the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers, and up the Mississippi to a little French village in Randolph County. The name of this town was Kaskaskia, probably the oldest town in Illinois. It was in Randolph County, the oldest county in Illinois. Kaskaskia was then near the Mississippi River. It was the first capital of the State. On account of the changing bed of the river old Kaskaskia was finally inundated and washed away. There is nothing left to mark the historic town of Kaskaskia except what is now known as Kaskaskia Island out in the center of the Mississippi River. Proper care and control of the National Government's river would have prevented the river destruction of this old historic landmark.

If this bill with this provision passes the Senate and is signed by the President, about the latter of which I have no doubt, it then becomes the law for this extended control of the Mississippi. Our only difficulty then will be to convince the Mississippi River Commission of the amount of this appropriation we need for the upper Mississippi and how rapidly the work should be proceeded with.

Mr. Chairman, with the proper efforts on the part of the Mississippi River Commission, where heretofore a valley of more than 100 miles in length and several miles in width, filled and laden with towns, hamlets, homes, and vast fields of grain that have been swept away periodically, will be transformed into the garden spot of the land. Then, standing on the northern boundary of historic Randolph County and looking south over Jackson County, the home of Gen. John A. Logan when he last sat in this House as a Representative from this same portion of Illinois; and looking farther on, into Union County, made famous in our history on account of the fact that one of the great Lincoln-Douglas debates was held in Jonesboro, the present county seat; and looking still farther south, into Alexander County, which extends to the Ohio, the county by nature predestined to be the home of the greatest city in the whole Mississippi Valley, one will see this great expanse, frequented by Mississippi River devastations and occupied by terrified farmers, transformed into a most beautiful valley of teeming harvestry and ripening grain, resounding with the contented prattle and song of little children and the lullaby of the undisturbed chirp of the song bird.

This project is thoroughly justified from every angle of view. By raising and strengthening the leeves the channel of the Mississippi is made permanent. The channel of the river becomes deeper and swifter on account of its permanency, and is therefore an aid to navigation. Commerce on the river will be vastly increased. Our special blessings and benefits will inure to the benefit and wealth of the Nation generally. My greatest hopes and efforts shall be to have this work done without delay. [Applause.]

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, for several days I have unsuccessfully sought to have stricken from this bill items so wholly without merit, in my judgment, that no argument was ordinarily offered beyond a brief statement of facts taken from the several engineer's reports.

At the beginning of discussion several days ago, under the five-minute rule, we were advised that, judging from past history of this legislation, not one item was likely to be stricken from the bill, nor would one item be added thereto. In other words, its 66 pages represent the combined wisdom of a committee of 21 Members, and their determination as represented by the reported bill is ordinarily supported by Members of the House who have projects cared for in the bill. I have no personal interest in any items included in or excluded from the bill, and, in fact, never read its provisions nor saw an engineer's report prior to general debate upon the bill. In saying this I desire to add that I am trying to understand the items from a careful perusal of the reports, items that are quite frequently explained only by the particular member of the committee acquainted with or interested in the project. No complaint is recorded because of failure to strike any item from the bill, and in presenting the incomplete review of a few items out of the hundreds it contains I do not forget the courteous response given by the committee to all inquiries that have been offered.

This measure on present and future projects herein adopted comprehends an eventual expenditure of $76,000,000. If this large amount of money is to be expended, every Member is entitled to full information as to its purposes, and no effort is wasted in fairly presenting the facts to the House.

A discussion of the merits of the bill also involves its method of preparation and passage. To these points I shall address myself, including in my remarks a presentation of a few objectionable items, some of which were briefly urged under the five-minute rule.

RAPID GROWTH OF EXPENDITURES.

Notwithstanding the great decrease in navigation on inland waters, apart from traffic on the Great Lakes, river and harbor appropriations have increased in inverse proportion, as appears from the following statement:

The 1914 appropriation, including new projects, involves an estimate expenditure of $76,000,000.

I desire to discuss the merits of this bill without reference to political responsibility, apart from that which rests with any administration charged with the duty of economically administering the affairs of government. However, in asking your attention to the profligate waste of money, evidenced by many items in this bill which I propose to discuss, it is proper to present at the outset political platform pledges of the party in power. These appear from extracts offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY], when warning his colleagues of the vicious items contained in this rivers and harbors bill of 1914. He said, on page 5745 of the RECORD:

In 1904 we said:

"Large reductions can easily be made in the annual expenditures of the Government without impairing the efficiency of any branch of the public service, and we shall insist upon the strictest economy and frugality."

In 1908 we said:

"The Republican Congress in the session just ended made appropriations amounting to $1,800,000,000, exceeding the total expenditures of the past fiscal year by $90,000,000, leaving a deficit of more than $60,000,000 for the fiscal year just ended. We denounce the needless waste of the people's money which has resulted in the appalling increase."

In 1912 we said:

"We denounce the profligate waste of the money wrung from the people by oppressive taxation through the lavish appropriations of the recent Republican Congresses, which have kept taxes high and reduced the purchasing power of the people."

And yet the last Congress appropriated $2,054,584,510. How does that compare with the Republican expenditure, when we are complaining of their extravagance? In 1904 the Republicans expended $736,578,402.76. In 1908 they expended $918,362,329.07. The Republicans in the Fifty-seventh Congress spent on rivers and harbors $52,783,349; in the Fifty-ninth Congress they spent on rivers and harbors $60,754,863. We Democrats spent on rivers and harbors in the Sixty-first Congress $80,263,960.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Before entering into a discussion of the merits of the bill I desire here to express my high respect for the gentleman from Texas, who consistently and fearlessly has criticized pernicious items in the bill whether projects located in Massachusetts or in Texas.

CONTRIBUTIONS BY COMMUNITIES.

Mr. Chairman, before the first page of the bill was read under the five-minute rule I offered, on March 20, an amendment to strike out that part of the first section which made appropriations "immediately available" and substituting therefor a provision requiring the State, county, city, or locality to contribute an equal amount to that expended by the General Government. It is carrying out the principle invoked in a bill granting Federal aid to highways, and in its operation would do much to remove the temptation now offered in trying to get something for nothing. I believe some such provision, with limited power of granting possible exceptions, should be lodged with the President, where responsibility could be centered, thereby materially reducing the amounts contained in these appropriation bills. It is a power now attempted to be occasionally exercised by engineers in the case of some little, helpless, hapless community, but the Chief Engineer nullifies recommendations of his subordinates and the practice is honored by nonobservance. The amendment offered was as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Amend by striking out from line 5, page 1, the words 'to be immediately available,' and to further add to line 9, page 1, the following:

"'Provided, That one half of each separate appropriation hereinafter specifically named shall be available whenever there shall be contributed by any State, county, city, or locality, or localities an amount equal to one half of such appropriation, which amount so raised shall be placed to the order of the Secretary of War and shall be expended by him pursuant to the report of the United States engineers on such project:

Provided further, That the remaining half of each appropriation hereinafter provided shall be retained in the Treasury, subject to the order of the Secretary of War, and to be used by him whenever needed in the completion of the project for which such appropriation is made.'"

The amendment after debate was rejected.

A CHECK ON WASTEFUL PROJECTS.

Mr. Chairman, upon the rejection of the amendment requiring contributions I offered a second amendment which I take from the RECORD:

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the amendment be reported again.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the amendment will be again reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Amend, by striking out from line 5, page 1, the words 'to be immediately available,' and further, by adding to line 9, page 1, the following:

"'Provided, That if the President and Secretary of War shall upon investigation ascertain and determine that any project or projects hereinafter provided for are not of material value to the public, they may in their discretion withhold such specific appropriation until further action by Congress.'"

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MURDOCK) there were—ayes 10, noes 77.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

It is needless to present the arguments urged in favor of and against the amendment. Members of the House, apparently jealous of the surrender of any possible prerogative, oppose any restriction. Possibly the uncertain value of some doubtful project carefully nursed along until it becomes a part of the bill serves to warp their judgment. Frankly, I will say that if this proposed discretion should be delegated to the engineers' office it would only serve to chase the proposition around the circle, as occurs under existing law.

The engineer would be subjected to the same influences which now determine his judgment, and I do not believe any man on the floor of this House would consent to be governed by the business judgment of an Army engineer, as evidenced by the reports I am about to present.

The first item in the bill to which objection was raised was one covered by the first engineers' report I have been able to secure. It has no special significance, and the reports offered are for the purpose of showing the general character of projects recommended by engineers—not to furnish any list of objectionable items from any particular State.

MATAWAN CREEK, N. J., $72,000.

(Doc. No. 43, 63d Cong.)

Page 2 states that to June 30, 1912, there had been expended on original construction and subsequent maintenance, $65,647.96.

The report states that the freight traffic is received from three small factories and a proposed two-mile extension is for the benefit of these factories. Of the 80,687 tons shipped during the fiscal year ending 1912, brick, coal, top soil, sand, and fertilizer from the factories covered all but 544 tons, as appears by the following statement:

Freight traffic.

Articles.	Amount in customary units.		Amount in short tons.	Valuation.

Data regarding commercial conditions of Matawan Creek, furnished by parties engaged in commerce along the river.

	The New Jersey Co.	Judson Conover.	The Alphano Humus Co.
1. (a) Is depth of water sufficient for present demands of commerce?	No	No	No.
(b) If not, what depth is required?	At least 8 feet at low tide.	6 feet	12 feet.
2. (a) What depth would be sufficient for prospective demands of commerce?	8 feet	do	Do.
(b) Give reason for answer.	Take any boat likely to be used here.	Can not do much business now on creek.	Would get larger vessels in.

Data regarding commercial conditions of Matawan Creek, etc.—Contd.

	The New Jersey Co.	Judson Conover.	The Alphano Humus Co.
3. What changes or increase of commerce would result from increase of channel dimensions?	We are advised that there would be a large increase and it would open up the properties for large manufacturing establishments.	200 per cent	100 per cent.
4. Would an increase of channel depths probably have any effect to reduce freight rates?	Yes; at least 25 per cent; we are offered practically no reduction now in writing.	Yes	Very much.
5. Have you any plans for increase of receipts or shipments by water?	Yes; we are increasing all the time, our shipments since June (3 months) being practically two-thirds as much as for the 12 months preceding, and this in spite of the fact that we are much handicapped with the stream as it is.		Yes.

I quote briefly from the discussion on this item of the bill contained in the RECORD of March 21:

Mr. FREAR. Page 5 of the statement offered by the engineer. Top soil, 30,000 tons; lumber, 332 tons; fertilizer, 5,000 tons. Miscellaneous and all other is 469 tons, and there is not a single item of merchandise. Six hundred and eighty-seven tons are shipped outside of that already mentioned. So far as I can understand, the people of these three or four factories want an 8-foot channel. That is the only thing that will serve their purpose, as shown on page 5. Reading on page 6, I find:

"On Matawan Creek there is one public dock, owned by the municipality, located about 700 feet east of the New York & Long Branch Railroad Co. This dock is open to all on equal terms, but is in bad repair and practically inaccessible, owing to the shallowness of the water, and is practically unused."

That is the kind of harbor it is proposed to appropriate $72,000 for, after having already expended $65,000, in order to serve, as the report apparently indicates, several manufacturers or people who have fertilizer establishments. I ask if that is correct?

Mr. SCULLY. That is correct.

Mr. FREAR. If that be so, then I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Page 10, strike out all of lines 3, 4, 5, and 6."

Mr. SCULLY is a member of the Rivers and Harbors Committee from New Jersey. His statement that this improvement is for the sole benefit of these manufacturers is illuminating. Sixty-five thousand six hundred and forty-seven dollars and ninety-six cents has already been spent at that place by the intelligent engineers and a further appropriation of $72,115 is recommended.

Two railways apparently intersect and divide freight traffic. The engineer, W. T. Rossell, says:

In my opinion, the estimates now presented show that this is an improvement worthy to be made by the General Government.

And he recommends an additional appropriation of $72,115.70, with an annual maintenance of $5,000 for the benefit of a brick factory and a fertilizer factory.

A statement of the facts is sufficient to present the objectionable character of such appropriations by the Government.

The amendment was rejected.

SHOAL HARBOR AND COMPTON CREEK, N. J., $56,800.

(Doc. No. 40, 63d Cong.)

Page 2 states that to June 30, 1912, $48,491.27 has been expended, of which $31,491.27 was for maintenance. Page 7 states:

There are no docks located on this waterway owned by the public at which terminal facilities are extended to all on equal terms, but a private dock belonging to J. H. Smith & Co., manufacturers of fertilizer and fish oil, is on Compton Creek, but its facilities are not open to the public.

From page 6 I insert statement of freight traffic:

Freight traffic.

Articles.	Amount in customary units.	Amount in short tons.	Valuation.
Coal	3,125 long tons	3,500	$15,500
Brick	250,000	600	1,400
Chemicals and colors	200 short tons	200	8,000
Cement and plaster	300 short tons	300	3,000
Fish and clams	55,500 short tons	55,500	518,000
Oils and gasoline	3,850 barrels	750	36,500
Lumber	70,000 feet b. m	22	2,100
Machinery	30 short tons	30	4,000
Fertilizer	800 short tons	800	24,000
Total		61,702	612,500

Also an enlightening extract from a letter quoted by the intelligent engineer, W. T. Rossell, which contains the milk in the coconut:

The Fertilizer Chemical Co. has been incorporated under the laws of New Jersey. Five hundred acres of land has been contracted for, which has 2,500 feet front on the Sandy Hook or Raritan Bay, with about the same frontage on Shoal Harbor or Compton Creek. The riparian rights have been awarded. Three hundred feet of dock has been built on the creek, and 300 feet more is to be added at once; some buildings have been erected; a power plant has been installed; all with the purpose in view of manufacturing fertilizers and cement.

The following dialogue, taken from the RECORD of March 21, shows Mr. Scully's contribution to the general fund of information:

Mr. SCULLY. The gentleman does not mean to convey the idea that a stream having a commerce of a value of over $600,000 is not worthy of improvement?

Mr. FREAR. I will tell this committee, if the gentleman will permit, just what this commerce is. You have 55,000 tons of clams, which can be taken in any kind of a boat. We have appropriated and spent in past years $48,000 for this stream——

Mr. SCULLY. That is right.

Mr. FREAR. And there is proposed here an appropriation of $56,800 more for 55,000 tons of clams shipped last year. That is all you have outside of 3,000 tons of coal and 800 tons of fertilizer.

Mr. SCULLY. Oh, we ship coal, brick——

Mr. FREAR. Oh, surely, you have shown 600 tons of brick, but we are asked to build a proposition of this kind for $56,000. The Government ought not to help you to ship 600 tons of brick. You can put that on a flatboat and float it down at any time. That is the amount of commerce at this point.

And the intelligent engineer concludes on page 7 of the report:

In my opinion Shoal Harbor and Compton Creek is worthy of improvement by the General Government.

The amendment to strike out was rejected.

MURDERKILL RIVER, DEL., $12,000.

(Doc. No. 149.)

Page 2 of the report states that local interests at the village of Frederica, located somewhere on this stream with the bloodthirsty name, are pining for an 8-foot channel to Delaware Bay. Frederica is a few miles up a crooked creek on which $78,360 has already been spent by the Government. Frederica demands $94,000 more with $4,000 annually in perpetuity for maintenance. A little steamboat gets up to Frederica twice a week (on p. 6), and the improvement demanded consists of three cut-off canals which will bring Frederica 1½ miles nearer navigation. The intelligent engineer, Edw. Burr, says the Government should dig canals on this crooked creek at a cost of $31,468, in addition to $78,365 already spent, so that Frederica can save 1½ miles in getting to real water. Nothing is said about Frederica paying for any of this work. Aside from the objectional proposition of building a canal for Frederica's exclusive benefit occurs a piecemeal condition in the bill, strenuously and rightfully opposed. A full appropriation is demanded, but the Rivers and Harbors Committee has other hungry mouths to feed and so advances only $12,000, leaving the rest to be fought for in future bills.

If the engineers' recommendations, in order to effect necessary contracts, are of value, and they seem businesslike, then the committee's action is peculiar. No justification has been offered for such action. After examining this report it is impossible to understand on what principle of public policy the Government is called upon to build three cut-off canals to shorten a creek without demanding some contribution from the community benefited. I have omitted data which indicates the whole project is a piece of engineering stupidity, so far as any Government interest is concerned. In my humble judgment we could as properly build a village church as to dig this canal, but interested parties and Army engineers see through colored spectacles when the Government pays the bills.

The amendment to strike out was defeated.

MISPILLION RIVER, DEL., $35,200.

(Doc. No. 678, 62d Cong.)

Page 2 recommends a full first appropriation for this job of $70,400, but the Rivers and Harbors Committee again ignores the engineer's request because of so many insistent demands from other hungry mouths.

It is here proposed to have the Government dig five cut-offs of 9,000 feet in length, almost 2 miles—which will shorten the distance from the mouth to the head of navigation about 12,700 feet. The estimated cost of the work proposed is $70,400, with an annual maintenance charge of $5,000.

I quote from page 3. On page 5 appears the statement—

There are no public wharves on the Mispillion.

The report further shows that $78,000 has already been spent by the Government, although "the Delaware, Maryland & Virginia branch of the Pennsylvania Railway passes through the town and shares with the river in traffic furnished by the town and vicinity." This is a 13-mile stream to be canalized at the rate of $6,000 a mile. A ubiquitous fertilizing factory will also be benefited by this 9,000-foot canal. The only comment that need be offered is that this indefensible project is one of scores of small appropriations in the bill that indicate just how far the engineer watchdogs of the Treasury are on the job.

Motion to strike out was rejected.

ROCKHOLE CREEK, MD., $11,800.

(H. Doc. No. 161.)

The engineer on this proposition, W. M. Black, had an inspiration, and said, on page 3:

The board believes this to be a case in which local interests would receive special benefits and that the locality should share in the first cost of the work if the United States is to bear the subsequent expense of maintenance.

An admirable suggestion, although it can not explain the inexcusable recommendation that the Government ought to pay anything at all. After the chief engineer indorsed Black's proposal for equal contributions the Rivers and Harbors Committee bumped in, as is shown by the debate on this project, which occurred on March 23. I quote:

Mr. FREAR. I have to hurry up, and I want to ask the chairman of the committee a question before I get through. I read from the report, on page 2, the following:

"Rockhole Creek empties into Herring Bay, which is situated on the westerly side of Chesapeake Bay, about 20 miles by water below Annapolis, Md. There is now a controlling depth of 3 feet in Rockhole Creek from the mouth to the bridge, a distance of 1 mile. The district officer reports that the creek is used by 40 to 50 sailing vessels of from 10 to 30 tons, and also by more than 100 gasoline boats of from 3 to 5 tons capacity used in oystering."

Further down on the page it says:

"The board believes that this is a case in which local interests would receive special benefits, and that the locality should share in the first cost of the work if the United States is to bear the subsequent expense of maintenance. The board therefore recommends the improvement proposed by the district officer, at a total estimated cost of $12,280 and not to exceed $500 per annum for maintenance, provided that before any work is undertaken by the United States"—

Notice how safely the committee has hedged the interests of the United States in this insignificant case—

"local interests shall contribute one-half the estimated first cost of the work, or $6,140."

That poor little oyster village has got to contribute one-half toward the project, but Baltimore and every other influential community gets a free gift.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I want to say to the gentleman that there is a later report on that.

Mr. FREAR. I am going to ask you a question in a moment. Reading further down, it says:

"In general the methods described in the report of the district officer, at an estimated cost of $12,280 for first construction and not to exceed $500 annually for maintenance, provided that one-half the estimated first cost of the improvement be contributed by local interests before any work is undertaken by the United States. The full share of the expense to be borne by the United States, $6,140, should be provided in one appropriation."

This bill provides $11,800, but you only propose in the report to contribute $6,000, which is about one-half of the amount.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Does the gentleman want information?

Mr. FREAR. Yes. I shall be glad to have an answer right there, please.

Mr. SPARKMAN. There is a later report on that.

Mr. FREAR. What is the amount? I do not care about the report.

Mr. SPARKMAN. The conditions are changed.

Mr. FREAR. What is the change in conditions?

Mr. SPARKMAN. It is simply provided that the localities there shall put up a wharf.

Mr. FREAR. Why should not the localities there contribute as the citizens elsewhere do? You are following the report of the engineer, according to repeated statements from the committee, and here it is. Why not follow it in this case?

Yet the committee in its wisdom decides that local contribution is unnecessary, although the engineers unanimously say local interests will receive special benefits.

For inexcusable diversion of public funds, I call attention to this item and its treatment by the committee.

Amendment to strike out rejected.

BRETON BAY, MD., $3,000.

(H. Doc. No. 127.)

This project is small, but not too small to escape the eagle eye of the Chief Engineer. The district engineer was disgusted with the proposition, and says, page 6:

Any extension of the present project for Breton Bay, Md., is not deemed worthy of being undertaken by the United States at the present time.

Doubtless his knowledge that the Government had already dumped $37,500 into this "estuary of the Potomac River" influenced his judgment. The intelligent Chief of Engineers modifies the project and recommends an appropriation, while the Government foots the bill for this estuary.

Amendment to strike out rejected.

TRED AVON RIVER, MD., $19,600.

(Doc. No. 27.)

This appropriation is for a channel 8 feet deep to Easton Point, a distance of 2,100 feet, for use of boats carrying in all 5,000 tons of freight per year, and "it is desired by the business interests of the place that the channel be extended to bring navigation nearer the town." I desire to present to your notice the pig-headed attitude of a committee of Easton business men, found on pages 6 and 7 of the report, wherein they admit possessing railway and river traffic for their town; that the banks have deposits aggregating $2,125,000, and the region benefited has an assessed valuation of $13,000,000. Easton has business men who are investing elsewhere just because the Government has failed to jump promptly to the aid of a $13,000,000 community, which will get the sole benefit from the improvement. I can offer nothing clearer on the project than a brief extract from the discussion in the House on March 23, when the item was under consideration:

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of presenting this report, but the suggestion occurred to me after I rose in regard to the question of filibustering. I have not discussed this matter with the other gentleman here who has been objecting, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY], and whatever I have said has been upon my own initiative, and he has proceeded upon his own initiative. Now, I desire to read from page 5 of this report:

"4. Easton, the county seat of Talbot County, Md., has a population within its corporate limits and immediately adjacent thereto of about 4,000 people. It has four banks with aggregate deposits of $2,125,000. The assessable value of property within the county is $13,000,000. The town is enterprising and is actively seeking to enlarge its water facilities. A committee of citizens, in response to an inquiry from this office, furnished a letter, appended hereto, under date of November 30, 1912, stating conditions at the locality. The Baltimore, Chesapeake & Atlantic Railway Co. operates a daily line of steamers between Easton and Baltimore throughout the year. These steamers handle a general commerce of over 5,000 tons a year, valued at more than $500,000, and carry about 9,000 passengers. The town is upon two railroads—the Baltimore, Chesapeake & Atlantic and the Philadelphia, Baltimore & Washington. Attention is invited to the statement in the letter of the committee, which was corroborated by information obtained upon the ground that several industrial plants would have located upon the Tred Avon River above Easton Point had a proper depth of water existed in that part of the stream to enable them to transact their business. Some, even those financed entirely with Easton capital, have had to seek other localities, where the requisite depth existed, while others are still in abeyance and would probably locate at this town were the opportunities offered. It is believed also that the extension of the channel so as to afford a better water front and bring it nearer to the town will result in a decrease of freight rates."

Mr. Chairman, those gentlemen living in Easton are not asked to contribute one dollar, but they are threatening, according to the engineer's report, to leave Easton and go elsewhere. On such a report as that an appropriation of $19,600 is made by the Government to a community that has $13,000,000 assessed valuation and banks with $2,000,000 on deposit. Just one moment more. I am not going to read all these reports before me. I say this in justification of the position I have taken at the invitation of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS]. I have many cases here of similar character to those I have read. And it seems to me they are almost identical on the question of contribution which should be made by the locality before any appropriation is made. I have no desire to trespass upon the time of the committee, but I shall occasionally refer to matters as they come up during the reading of the bill which I think ought to be explained.

Amendment to strike out rejected.

TANGIER CHANNEL, VA., $16,434.

(Doc. No. 107.)

Tangier Island is a small marshy tract somewhere in Chesapeake Bay—just where the engineer sayeth not, excepting it is 15 miles from Crisfield, Md.

The general elevation of the island is only about 2 feet above high tide.

We are enlightened as to the importance of the project by the engineer's illuminating remark that—this case is identical with that of Twitch Cove.

We read on page 7 of the report:

Unfavorable reports, as a result of preliminary examinations made with a view to dredging a channel, were made in 1891 and 1899.

However, the district engineer who now examines the project offers to go half way on a poor proposition by saying:

If an anchorage be found necessary, local interests should either provide it or contribute to its construction.

He concludes by recommending a 4-foot channel, to cost $8,525. The brass-buttoned chief decides, however, that Uncle Sam should supply the anchorage, against the recommendation of the district official, and so a project discarded in 1891 and 1899 is now accepted and the recommended appropriation is doubled, without any contribution. What is $16,434 to the Chief of Engineers on June 13, 1913?

Amendment to strike out rejected.

OYSTER CHANNEL, VA., $11,250.

(H. Doc. No. 209.)

Oyster is a small village, says the report, in Accomac County, Va. The succulent bivalve has been traveling to civilization for over a century over a "mud flat about three-fourths of a mile across, which is nearly bare at low water," all of which indicates that any venturesome oyster seeking to get into the Atlantic Ocean at low water will not get his feet wet while crossing the bar. The community hypnotized the engineer and the Rivers and Harbors Committee into a contribution of $11,250 from the Government, provided Oyster contributes an equal amount. The proposition of contribution invoked is praiseworthy, but just why Oyster's mud flat should be removed and just why Oyster should be made to contribute one-half of the cost, if so, are secrets locked up in the brain of the engineer who passes by ill-smelling fertilizer factories that are cared for by the Government to take it out on the inoffensive oyster.

LOCKLIES CREEK, VA., $4,100.

(Doc. No. 612.)

It is a shame to pick out this $4,000 item which is less than one-thousandth of the total appropriation contained in the bill. I expect to reach some bigger projects in a few minutes, but these items are pointed out, among scores of like character, in order that the House and the people of the country may know what trifling work occupies the time of United States engineers. Locklies Creek is another "estuary" about 1½ miles long. It is not a town nor village, but some one told the engineer that 3,000 tons pass up and down the estuary every year, carried by skiffs or gasoline boats. Locklies Creek wants $4,100, and a report is made on the project by Frederic V. Abbot, colonel Corps of Engineers, senior member of the board present. The board's report was based upon a survey by W. C. Langfitt, lieutenant colonel, Corps of Engineers, pages 5 to 7. This report was forwarded by W. M. Black, who is colonel, Corps of Engineers, page 7.

Before the survey was decided upon by the War Department, according to the report, Lieut. Col. W. C. Langfitt, Corps of Engineers, made a preliminary examination of Locklies Creek, Va., as appears from page 3 of the report. This examination was sent from Washington to New York to William T. Rossell, colonel, Corps of Engineers, division engineer, who concurred (p. 5), under date of December 26, 1912. To show that he had not changed his mind, William T. Rossell, colonel, Corps of Engineers, senior member of the board, acting for the board, on January 20, 1913, confirmed his individual action, whereupon Edward Burr, colonel, Corps of Engineers, Acting Chief of Engineers, also agreed (p. 2). Thereupon Lindley M. Garrison, Secretary of War, transmitted the report to the Speaker.

And so forth.

SCUPPERNONG RIVER, N. C., $33,800.

(Doc. 1196, 62d Cong.)

We now reach North Carolina, with its 25 hungry projects, among which the Scuppernong grape contends with the toothsome oyster of Virginia for popular favor at the cash drawer of the Treasury.

The report says (p. 9) between the construction of the Norfolk Southern Railroad in 1908 and the financial panic that year river commerce was reduced 82 per cent. Scuppernong River's commerce suffered from both calamities, so to speak. On page 8 appears a rather pretentious statement of river freight; but after deducting lumber, fertilizer, and heavy goods that can be easily handled by present service, it shows the traffic in 1908 to be 2,213 tons and in 1909 4,151 tons. On page 4 appears the engineer's statement that "within the past five or six years its inhabitants have awakened." The period is inserted by myself, although the real period dates back to the days when Sir Walter Raleigh landed on Roanoke Island, near Scuppernong, several centuries ago. From the report (p. 7) it appears the inhabitants woke up long enough in 1910 to get a balance of $27,750, which went into the Scuppernong from the Government Treasury. To prove the meritorious character of the project on this creek the engineer reports (p. 11):

The banks are low and swampy, averaging about 1½ feet above the water surface, and in most cases defined only by living growths of trees and water brush—

This is an engineer's imaginative description of the Scuppernong, not of the Dismal Swamp. Continuing he says:

A considerable amount of snagging will be required, and at the proposed cut-offs heavy clearing must be done. The necessary snagging has been included in the estimates.

The truthful engineer should have added that the best exhibition of snagging connected with the project is evidenced when $33,800 is snagged out of the Treasury for this creek.

Motion to strike out rejected.

DEEP CREEK, N. C., $5,400.

(Doc. No. 1362, 62d Cong.)

This is another of North Carolina's 25 scoops from the United States Treasury. In the debate on the items of the bill Bennett Creek got past me, but is entitled to be considered after Deep Creek is cleaned up or washed out with this $5,400 appropriation. The following extract from the discussion occurred over this item on March 23:

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I will say there is a very interesting line of reading for anyone who will take up these matters, as I did on the advice of members of the committee, to ascertain the facts. I have been endeavoring to do that; but no matter what I present here, no matter how absurd the conditions, no matter what local service is to be given, in every case the committee is supported. As the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] well said, there will not be a chance to get anything in or out of this bill. It is locked in and you have thrown away the key. But I just want to say a word about Deep Creek as long as I can not get back to Bennett Creek. The district officer says that the annual commerce of the locality is estimated at 2,000 tons. Think of it! Such a tremendous amount! That commerce is at present handled by rail through Scuppernong. That is the town of the Scuppernong grape. I read:

"The division engineer is of opinion that this short stream is unworthy of improvement by the United States."

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. As the gentleman read I caught it that the division officer said that this was inadvisable.

Mr. FREAR. Certainly. I read again:

"The division engineer is of opinion that this short stream is unworthy of improvement by the United States."

Mr. MURDOCK. Did the Chief of Engineers overrule this man?

Mr. FREAR. So I understand. Yes. Reading further we find:

"3. There is a population of about 700 within 3 miles of the stream, the principal occupation being farming. The annual commerce is estimated at 2,000 tons, valued at $157,000, which commerce is at present handled by rail through Scuppernong. In connection with his preliminary examination, the district officer gave a public hearing, at which interested parties explained the needs of improvement, and on June 3 Hon. J. H. SMALL, M. C., came before the board for a similar purpose."

It is interesting to learn that the division engineer and the board refused to budge, even for a Congressman. But for "ways that are dark" our attention is now directed to the report of Gen. W. H. Bixby, Chief Engineer, who engineered things at Washington on February 8, 1913, while Congress was in session. It is also a pleasure to note that in giving weighty consideration to Deep Creek, Gen. Bixby laid aside his multifarious duties connected with the $7,235,710 Chesapeake & Delaware Canal, and the $63,000,000 canalization of the Ohio River, together with the $275,000,000 improvement of the Mississippi River. Gen. Bixby did not intend to allow a sparrow to fall unnoticed, providing any M. C. had an interest in Deep Creek.

Motion to strike out rejected.

NORTHEAST, CAPE FEAR RIVER, $38,375.

(Doc. No. 1356, 62d Cong.)

This is another of those 25 raids on the Treasury by North Carolina. The river with this long name is not a river at all; only a creek, on which the Duplin, a dwarfed apology for a steamboat, makes two trips each week. I can not do justice to this report. The cloven hoof leaves its trace from beginning to end.

I will quote from the discussion of this item on the floor of the House March 23, and supplement it with one paragraph from the report:

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I realize it is perfectly useless to move to strike out that paragraph, no matter what state of facts is presented here. Yet I feel it is my duty in this connection to explain that this is one of those fertilizer cases where you are asked to expend $38,375 in order that three companies may be helped out—companies that have a commerce of 113,700 tons. The report says that considerable interest has been manifested in securing an extension of deep water for a further distance of about 1½ miles; that on this stretch are located several important fertilizer factories having a combined commerce estimated at 113,700 tons. The board states that the three fertilizer factories now have a considerable tonnage that would be affected by a more commodious channel; that such a channel would result in a material saving in the handling of their heavier commodities.

Well, I suppose it would. To continue:

"It appears that these concerns would be directly benefited, while the general public would be indirectly benefited by the work. After mature consideration the board reports that in its opinion it is advisable for the United States to undertake the construction of a channel 150 feet wide and 22 feet deep, as proposed by the district officer, provided local or other interests will contribute one-half of the cost of first construction."

I will ask the chairman of the committee if they contributed one-half?

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I think I can answer the question.

Mr. FREAR. I am directing my inquiry to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. PAYNE. A high private will not do.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I have not had time to look that over.

Mr. FREAR. Then I will accept the answer of the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. SPARKMAN. The clerk of the committee tells me that the localities have contributed one-half.

Mr. FREAR. An excellent provision, it seems to me, and it ought to be in practically every proposition; but I do not think the Government of the United States should expend $38,375 to help out fertilizer factories.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. Does the gentleman mean to say that the only people who will be benefited by this expenditure of $38,375 are private fertilizer companies?

Mr. FREAR. Three fertilizer companies, says the report of the engineer. Of course it is a mighty good thing to have some one here to get those things through Congress, if you want to vote them, but it does seem to me there ought to be a limit to the character of appropriations that are made by this Congress or any other Congress, and I call on the gentlemen on the other side, who have made professions of economy in their platform, to explain the necessity for this appropriation and to show a better record than is being made on this appropriation bill.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Certainly.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Does the gentleman not think that possibly the fertilizer companies with whom we were dealing in New Jersey on Saturday, dealt with the fertilizer companies in North Carolina and South Carolina, and that they will deal with the other fertilizer companies all the way around the coast?

Mr. FREAR. Well, in some way or other fertilization has had a wonderful effect on the growth of the appropriations here. I move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin to strike out the paragraph.

The motion was rejected.

And this concluding paragraph from the report of Capt. Rand shows how the Treasury is raided. He says, on page 8 of the report:

9. The interested concerns, the fertilizer manufacturers, ask this particularly that they may be relieved from extra costs, on vessels for incoming cargo chartered to Wilmington, which in many cases refuse to go to the works, which they contend are not on Wilmington Harbor, to which their charter reads. These interests hope that the congressional legislation for the improvement will be so worded as to make the portion of the river past their wharves part of Wilmington Harbor. This does not, however, seem to me a compelling reason—apparently the same result could be more readily effected by local and State legislation extending the boundaries of the city of Wilmington to include the works and removing restrictions preventing erection of fertilizer works within the city limits so far as applied to the district where they now are—thus incidentally bringing them within the taxable area, possibly why they prefer it done by congressional action.

10. On this part of the river there is little, if any, opportunity for the establishment of general transportation wharves, terminals, or transfer facilities, and no probability that such will ever be needed. The harbor would here be purely an industrial one for the benefit of the materials utilized in manufacturing interests immediately on its banks, and they can be relied on to provide such terminals as they may need.

Motion to strike out rejected.

ON THE RAGING NORTHEAST RIVER.

Before leaving this remarkable river, for which Uncle Sam is handing out cash from his strong box, I quote literally from the Army Engineers' Report for 1913, pages 496 and 497.

19. Northeast and Black Rivers, and Cape Fear River above Wilmington, N. C.—(a) Northeast River, a tributary of Cape Fear River, rises in the northern part of Duplin County and flows in a general southerly direction, emptying into the Cape Fear River at Wilmington. Length of river, 130 miles. Section under improvement, from mouth to Kornegays Bridge, 103 miles. Distance from mouth to Bannermans Bridge, 48 miles; to Hallsville, 88 miles, to Kornegays Bridge, the head of navigation, 103 miles.

* * * * * * * *

Amount expended on present project up to June 30, 1913, was $33,738.86, of which $10,687.96 was for improvement and $32,050.90 for maintenance.

Received from rent, sales, etc., $243.33.

As a result of the expenditures to date, the channel has been cleared wherever needed. Six feet of water can be carried to Bannermans Bridge and 3 feet to Crooms Bridge during all stages of the water.

From Crooms Bridge to Kornegays Bridge, the head of navigation, the river is so shallow that navigation is practicable only when the water is up. This is liable to occur at any time, but during the summer low stages usually prevail.

The minimum low-water depth to Bannermans Bridge is 6 feet; to Crooms Bridge, 3 feet; to Hallsville, 0.5 feet; to Kornegays Bridge (the head of navigation), 0.1 foot.

From the report we are solemnly told that after spending $32,050.90 on this North Carolina "project" the Government has obtained a depth of 5 inches at Hallsville, and 15 miles further up the river, at the end of the "project" and head of navigation, we have secured (in the channel) a depth of 1 inch—all for $32,050.90. The report says so. Nor is this a page from Hans Andersen's fairy tales. It is from the "Report of Chief of Engineers, United States Army, 1913. In three parts. Part 1."

LUMBER CREEK, N. C., $2,000.

(Doc. No. 138.)

This is another of the 25 petty propositions given by the committee to North Carolina. I quote from page 3 of the nine-page engineers' report:

Under appropriations amounting to $19,000 this river was cleared of the worst snags and obstructions as far up as Lumberton, a distance of 70.7 miles, during the period 1889–1897, since which time no work has been done. It appears that little advantage was taken of the improvement. The river is narrow, shallow, in places tortuous, and is obstructed by snags and sunken logs. Thirty-five bridges cross this stream between turnpike bridge and its mouth, only one of which has a draw. The others would have to be raised or provided with draws in order to fit the river for navigation.

2. It appears there is little demand for the improvement of the river for actual navigation, the principal object being the realization of the hope that it would result in a reduction of existing railroad freight rates. The physical characteristics of the stream are such that it can not be improved at reasonable expense to an extent that will permit a boat line to operate profitably. And, furthermore, the Little Peedee River, over which any through business would have to pass, has even less depth than the Lumber River, and until it is deepened the improvement of Lumber River would be of little value. The district officer is of opinion that Lumber River is not worthy of improvement at this time, and in this view the division engineer concurs.

3. Interested parties were informed of the unfavorable report of the district officer and given an opportunity of submitting their views to the board, but no communications on the subject have been received.

4. It seems clear from the description of this stream and from a study of the condition of the Little Peedee, over which commerce would have to be carried, that only a very light-draft navigation could be developed, except at very great cost, and it is not probable that if a moderate improvement were made that the river would be used to any considerable extent. Experience on other shallow streams indicates that it would not be profitable for a boat line to operate long distances on the draft of water that could be expected. In view of the foregoing, the board concurs in the opinion that it is not advisable at this time for the United States to undertake the improvement of Lumber River from its mouth to the turnpike bridge over said river.

5. In compliance with law, the board reports that there are no questions of terminal facilities, water power, or other related subjects having any material bearing upon the improvement of navigation at this locality.

For the board:

WM. T. ROSSELL,
Colonel, Corps of Engineers,
Senior Member of the Board.

It took nerve for Gen. Bixby to overturn that report, but he was equal to the task of recommending $2,000, and that amount is filched out of the Treasury by this reprehensible proposition.

BENNETT CREEK, N. C., $6,000.

(Doc. No. 1362, 62d Cong.)

This is another of the 25 projects that go to North Carolina. It should not be overlooked that the State gets in all $1,507,075, and that means getting money from Washington in earnest. Like the Scuppernong and several other creeks which run to the Federal Treasury, this is some creek. The 10-page report comments on the influence of Albemarle Sound, and says (p. 4):

The fluctuations of the surface level are due entirely to the effect of the winds reducing the level for several days at a time to two feet or more below normal level—from which it further appears that some wind blows across Albemarle Sound, as I have said during this debate, based on my personal experience. We are advised by the report that a boat manages to get up the creek once a week and that Gatesville has 300 people, more or less, there or thereabouts, from which it is fair to presume it has approximately 60 voters who are interested in this project. The report says that the bold navigators who ride the main on Bennett Creek are troubled by overhanging boughs and leafy branches which obscure the view. These should be cut down by Uncle Samuel's engineers. Logs and snags also abound. So says the report, page 5. Ninety per cent of the creek's commerce consists of logs, which accounts for the snags and overhanging boughs.

Gen. Bixby recognizes true merit when it knocks at his office door, and so when the creek's many good points have been reviewed by him he dashes off his approval. After which the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, temporarily occupying the rôle of the Ways and Means Committee, adopts the report, so that Bennett Creek is on the map and another of North Carolina's 25 projects has been snatched from the burning.

Motion to strike out rejected.

NEWBEGUN CREEK, N. C., $5,000.

(Doc. No. 24.)

This engineering scheme—another of North Carolina's new 25 waterway projects—will not be found on all maps. It can be located, however, on the engineer's map in the back of the report.

No cities, towns, or villages mar the quiet of its slumbers. It differs from Tennysons Brook, because this creek sometimes flows backward instead of always joining the rushing river. A tributary of Pasquotank, the waters of the Newbegun reach Albemarle Sound when the wind goes down. This seemingly strange circumstance is explained by the engineers' report, page 4, wherein it is stated that—the creek varies with the level of Albemarle Sound, which is largely influenced by the wind, and unfavorable winds may cause variations of 2 feet above or below mean level.

This is a variation of 4 feet between extreme levels, caused by the wind on Albemarle Sound. In order that full weight may be given to this remarkable engineering discovery it is noted that the sound only changes 2 feet when Bennett Creek is under consideration, but although this is the same sound and the same engineer we differentiate upon learning that this is a different wind over on Newbegun Creek.

Notwithstanding the name of this creek is up to date. The report shows (p. 5) that this is its first discovery and examination by Congress, although 30 years ago an attempt was made to "improve the bar." In this connection it will be remembered that North Carolina claims some advantages for its dispensatory system.

The report only asks for a 6-foot channel over the mud bar, whereas any unfavorable wind will reduce the level 2 feet, leaving the bar bare between the crest of waves. But this is a minor matter from an engineering standpoint.

NORTH CAROLINA COURTS THE LIMELIGHT.

I dislike to leave the creeks and winds of Albemarle Sound without expressing a hope that I may be able to return to its familiar surroundings when we pass through the Albemarle and Chesapeake Canal. Bearing on occasional lectures, to which members of the committee subjected me because of my presumed unfamiliarity with these projects, I submit the following contribution from the RECORD of March 23, in which the gentleman from North Carolina, with searching sarcasm, rebuked my lack of information:

Mr. FREAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. No; I can not yield * * * I will not yield unless the gentleman has some question to ask me that indicates some knowledge of the subject. [Laughter.]

Mr. FREAR. Very well; I will reply in my own time.

A few moments later I secured the floor, and the RECORD shows:

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, as I stated a moment ago, we have received lectures here quite constantly from the gentleman from North Carolina, and allow me to say to the committee that the gentleman enjoys the proud distinction of having the high-water mark of appropriations in this bill.

With one exception, he has more appropriations to his credit than any other man. And it does not become any Member here to lecture anyone else, nor for him to presume upon the lack of intelligence or judgment of any other Member. For instance, he made a gross error a moment ago. He said the gentleman from Wisconsin knew nothing about this place, Albemarle Sound. Why, I lived there. I know Kitty Hawk and I know Albemarle Sound just as well as the gentleman does. I lived in the most God-forsaken place in the whole world, and was sent there to the sandy, dreary coast at Kitty Hawk, where the Wright brothers afterwards went in order to be free from interference or observation by civilized beings while trying their flying machine. There is nothing there except a great expanse of sand. Albemarle Sound is subject to a rise of 2 feet from the wind when it blows across toward the mainland.

Mr. SMALL. What were you doing down on that sand?

Mr. FREAR. I was employed as a telegraph operator in the Signal Service of the Government at Kitty Hawk.

Mr. MOORE. I would like to know when you were last there.

Mr. FREAR. Now, the question I have in mind is this: It is known to every man, if not to the gentleman who comes from that State, that it is absolutely a mud bottom, and I have gone over it frequently, sometimes in a canoe. The mud would not hold an anchor. The rise of the waves in Albemarle Sound, as shown by my reports here, is 2 feet by the wind, and that proposed canal offers practically no protection to small craft in rough weather.

Mr. CALLAWAY. It was 7 feet in the gentleman's own town last December, was it not?

Mr. FREAR. I have forgotten the exact figures. But it seems to me it is not the duty of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL], with the abundance of appropriations he has secured, to lecture everyone who wants to investigate some of the facts in regard to the bill. We have rights here. We are sent here by our constituents, and my constituents are paying toward that $800,000 appropriation for a worthless canal, and they want to know what they are getting in return for their money. I can tell them from my own knowledge that they will get very little in return, and my judgment is not based upon any engineer's statement nor influenced by fear or favor.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there are a number of objectionable appropriations, and I may refer to one or two in the North Carolina gentleman's State. I will be very glad to do so. I have been trying to keep out of this discussion, but when gentlemen on the floor twit us about our lack of knowledge on these subjects, let me assure them that we are here seeking the best information that we can get, and we are not bound by any report of the engineers; we want the facts.

Mr. Chairman, I am not interested in any of these appropriations. I do not want to hurt the feelings of any gentleman. I have not a particle of interest in one here, in Wisconsin, or elsewhere. It does not make any difference to me, but I want to inquire, and the country is entitled to know, why we are paying out $43,000,000 for these appropriations and getting so little in return. I am willing to give an appropriation to any place where it is justified. But 25 appropriations in a single State, for the purpose simply of getting something for constituents, must be paid for by the rest of the country. Millions of dollars are wasted in this bill, and I am trying to get at the facts, and object to being lectured because of my inquiries.

MANY WASTEFUL APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. Chairman, I have presented nearly a score of venal, wasteful projects contained in this bill, which we learn from the committee have been approved by Army engineers, indorsed by local representatives, accepted by the committee, and are to be financed by the Federal Treasury.

The facts have been recited at some length because they are small grafts, given to serve favored localities, to benefit particular constituencies, but of no material service or value to general navigation. These items have been selected at random and they cover a variety of projects approved because of the influence behind them. They are not isolated cases, for investigation reveals they are characteristic of a majority of smaller projects.

Many others along the Atlantic Coast, some large and some small, I would gladly present for your consideration, but I believe enough have been offered to give a comprehensive understanding of how these particular appropriations are wasted.

Some worthy harbor projects along the coast, and others not so worthy, are necessarily crowded into the bill in order to get a strong resistless force behind the 1914 pork barrel. I will refrain from adding any more small river items to those already criticized excepting to give one or two river projects farther down the coast which present differing conditions and the different methods employed of artistically bleeding Uncle Samuel.

By way of parenthesis let me at this point offer a brief quotation from a distinguished Senator. It will be found on page 3527 of the RECORD for 1901, when the River and Harbor bill for that year was under discussion. I offered it without comment on March 21; I reoffer it for your thoughtful consideration. The South Carolina Senator said:

The Mississippi itself has quit having any steamboats on it almost, and the whole scheme of river improvement is a humbug and a steal; but if you are going to steal, let us divide it out, and do not go to complaining.

That this opinion of the bill was not alone shared by the distinguished Senator from South Carolina just quoted, permit me to give a brief extract from the 1901 RECORD, page 3547, wherein a distinguished Senator from Maryland was discussing a river and harbor bill that did not approach the iniquities contained in this $76,000,000 proposition before us. Speaking with all the fervor of honest indignation, he said:

I am opposed to this bill in toto, because I believe it to be the very worst of its kind and character that has ever been attempted to be passed by any Congress—and there have been bad bills of this kind and character before. I can remember when a river and harbor bill was passed some years ago, and the people rose up against the Congress which enacted it and defeated for reelection perhaps a hundred Members of the legislative body that had engaged in that measure. But this bill is worse than its prototype of former years * * *.

It is for that reason that I have risen in this morning hour to sound the note of warning to you, to tell you that the people will not forever stand silently by and see this reckless, this wasteful expenditure of their money. It is a measure that can not be defended by Congress. It is a measure that should be defeated by Congress, and I hope we shall be able to defeat it.

That same castigation is merited by the pending bill but I must hasten along in the discussion, to explain a unique proposition which follows:

KISSIMMEE CREEK OR RIVER, FLA., $47,000.

(Doc. No. 137.)

The illuminating disclosures affecting this real-estate project of an ex-Member of Congress appears in the RECORD from the debate on March 23:

"Improving Kissimmee River, Fla., in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 137, Sixty-third Congress, first session, $47,000."
